Bibliographical Abbreviations

All bibliographical abbreviations used in this dictionary are listed below, following the typography used in the text of the dictionary. Broadly, italic type is used for periodicals and for reference works; roman type is used for anthologies, series etc. (titles of individual volumes are italicized).

Full bibliographical information is not normally supplied in the list below if it is available elsewhere in the dictionary. Its availability is indicated as follows: D – in the list of 'Dictionaries and encyclopedias of music'; E – in the list of 'Editions, historical'; and P – in the list of 'Periodicals'; these lists are located in vol.28. For other items, in particular national (non-musical) biographical dictionaries, basic bibliographical information is given here; and in some cases extra information is supplied to clarify the abbreviation used.

Festschriften and congress reports are not generally covered in this list. Although Festschrift titles are sometimes shortened in the dictionary, sufficient information is always given for unambiguous identification (dedicatee; occasion, if the same person is dedicatee of more than one Festschrift; place and date of publication; and name(s) of editor(s) if known). For fuller information on musical Festschriften up to 1967 see W. Gerboth: An Index to Musical Festschriften and Similar Publications (New York, 1969). The published titles of congress reports are generally reduced to their essentials, but sufficient information is always given for purposes of identification (society or topic; place and date of occurrence; journal issue if published in a periodical; editor(s) and publication details in unfamiliar cases). A comprehensive list of musical and music-related 'Congress reports' appears in vol.28. Further information can be found in J. Tyrrell and R. Wise: A Guide to International Congress Reports in Music, 1900–1975 (London, 1979).

Library Sigla

The system of library sigla in this dictionary follows that used by Répertoire International des Sources Musicales, Kassel, as listed in its publication RISM-Bibliothekssigel (Kassel, 1999). Below are listed the sigla to be found; a few of them are additional to those published in the RISM list, but have been established in consultation with the RISM organization. Some original RISM sigla that have now been changed are retained here.

More information on individual libraries is available in the libraries list in volume 28.

In the dictionary, sigla are always printed in italic. In any listing of sources a national sigillum applies without repetition until it is contradicted.

Within each national list, entries are alphabetized by sigillum, first by capital letters (showing the city or town) and then by lower-case ones (showing the institution or collection).

A Note on the Use of the Dictionary

This note is intended as a short guide to the basic procedures and organization of the dictionary. A fuller account will be found in the Introduction, vol. l, pp.xix–xxix.

Abbreviations in general use in the dictionary are listed on pp.vii–xi; bibliographical ones (periodicals, reference works, editions etc.) are listed on pp.xiii–xviii and discographical abbrevations on pp.xix–xx.

Alphabetization of headings is based on the principle that words are read continuously, ignoring spaces, hyphens, accents, bracketed matter etc., up to the first comma; the same principle applies thereafter. 'Mc' and 'M'' are listed as 'Mac', 'St' as 'Saint'.

Bibliographies are arranged chronologically (within section, where divided), in order of year of first publication, and alphabetically by author within years.

Cross-references are shown in small capitals, with a large capital at the beginning of the first word of the entry referred to. Thus 'The instrument is related to the BASS TUBA' would mean that the entry referred to is not 'Bass tuba' but 'Tuba, bass'.

Signatures where the article was compiled by the editors or in the few cases where an author has wished to remain anonymous are indicated by a square box (□).

Work-lists are normally arranged chronologically (within section, where divided). Italic symbols used in them (like D-Dl or GB-Lbl) refer to the libraries holding sources, and are explained on pp.xxi–xxxvii; each national sigillum stands until contradicted.

1. Russian.

(i) Introduction. The regional variety of Russian folk music cannot be explained without taking into account the complex historical geography of the Russians.

Russian folk music has had long historical ties and relations of various kinds with the folklore of surrounding peoples, particularly that of Slavonic, Finno-Ugric and Turkic peoples. The centuries of stability of the agrarian traditions of the Russian village, despite its isolation, have been constantly broken by migrations of population, for example in the devastation of the south Russian lands during the Tatar-Mongol invasions of the 13th century, and the frequent resettling of people under the landowners during the epoch of serfdom, especially during the 16th century and later. Other disruptive factors were the colonization of new lands; long military service (in the 18th century); and, with the development of capitalism, seasonal work, the foundation of factories, the laying of railways and the building of cities, all of which primarily affected the male population.

Archaism in folklore still appears in the form of dialectical features that survive predominantly in the women's repertory: the dialect division of traditional peasant (as distinct from urban) folklore is an integral feature. Along with general national characteristics (structural patterns, themes, melodies, universally known songs, instruments), the basis of folklore continues to be regional traditions which sometimes have very old ethnic (pre-national) roots. Certain large folk music dialect divisions are clearly distinguishable: north, west, central and south Russian. These in turn are divided into many dialects (e.g. the Oka River basin, the upper Volga, the Don river, the White sea, etc.) and micro-regions (divided off by quite small rivers). Given the enormous dimensions of Russia, an exhaustive cartographic survey of Russian folk music dialects is difficult to achieve.

Russian folk music consists not only of many dialects but also of many layers. In it are found elements of Old Russian (East Slavonic) traditions, true Russian ones dating from the time of the emergence of the Russian nationality (14th to 16th centuries) and later ones. This co-existence implies an organic interpenetration, for the Old Russian forms survive in specifically Russian forms of expression, some more immediately perceptible (in the peasant tradition), others partly or completely imperceptible (in the urban tradition). The latter includes the culture of the larger mercantile villages, the larger settlements of non-serf villagers, the urban suburbs and the outskirts of factory and student centres.

A description of Russian folk music is hampered not only by its complexity but also by the fact that as a system it has been inadequately studied. Many collections are obviously incomplete, and of these much has not yet been systematized on a modern scholarly level, while a large quantity of material has not been published (most of the collections published are small anthologies). Reliable material is only gradually being amassed by researchers, and much remains to be done. Material has not been collected systematically over the whole country, cartography for several important parameters is difficult, and many links and relations remain unclear. Earlier generalizations were made on the basis of even more imperfect and scanty material and yet they have been accepted by scholars at home and abroad. These must be re-examined in the light of new and ever increasing data and new theoretical concepts. Two questions must be considered: to what epoch does a particular system belong, and to what region? To give a general picture (or model) of Russian folk music is deliberately to choose a pseudo-scientific compromise, to summarize what cannot be summarized – individual elements of varied and complex systems. At present, it is scarcely possible to do anything else, but it is important to realize the limits of such a description.

There are three basic ways of examining Russian folk music: regionally (by dialects), chronologically, or by genre. Ideally, all three would be combined, but the inadequate study of local styles and the lack of necessary documentation for a consistent chronological description make it impossible to present such an account at a scholarly level. It remains to examine Russian folk music by the groups of genres generally accepted in Russian folklore scholarship (see Propp, 1964), which allows certain conclusions to be drawn, while sometimes making use of the regional and historical aspects of data. Yet even this is a compromise, for the genre system is itself not final but constantly evolving, and far from adequate in certain folklore areas. Above all, there are many links and relationships between genres that pass unnoticed when the particular characteristics of specific genres are stressed. In reality folklore genres are not nearly so sharply distinguished as they are in their scientific rubrics. It is known, for instance, that the same text, subject or motif in various local dialects of one national tradition can exist in several different musical genres: it can be recited or chanted as in the epic, called out in formulae in rituals, expressed in laments, sung as a lyric song, danced to, played as a soldier's parade march or in an instrumental version, and so on. Nevertheless only the genre principle permits a formal characterization of folklore in close association with its social and cultural function, one that shows its 'text' and 'context' at the same time.

(ii) Song.

(a) Work songs and working pripevki. Such songs accompany physical work and help to organize it. As forms of work have changed, songs have disappeared and can be judged only from relatively late collections. They include the well-known song of the barge-haulers, Ey, ukhnem! (Balakirev, Bücher), the artel (working group) songs of the log rafters, carpenters, builders, skippers and others.

The pripevka (plural pripevki) is a short piece, something between a song and a cry or call. It can be a musical command, either inciting or accompanying work, and thus both active and rhythmic. It can also be the chanting of short verse lines (a sort of chastushka). Because of the collective nature of the work and the constant contacts between the workers of the artels, songs of this genre, in contrast to others, have a certain stylistic homogeneity everywhere. They are linked by a similar melodic transformation of the periodic rhythm of the work and the intonation of the spoken command, in the form of special short stereotyped musical phrases that are constantly repeated with slight variation. These usually consist of the major 2nd, perfect 4th and 5th, which may be isolated or in various combinations (ex.1). In choral performance their two- and three-part texture is also varied.

(b) Calendar songs and 'calls'. These do not occur everywhere. They are most typical of western and south-western Russia (Smolensk, Bryansk, Pskov regions) and the central Russian regions (Ryazan, Vladimir and others). They are divided into genres, according to the association of the songs with the calendar: winter kolyadï (carols), called variously kolyadki (see KOLĘDA), ovseni, tauseni, vinograd'ya, shchedrovki; New Year podblyudnïye songs foretelling the future; maslenichnïye (Shrovetide) songs, usually performed in February, seven weeks before the first spring new moon; springtime calls for the spring to arrive (the March vesnyanki, incantational spring songs, invocatory and performed as part of a ritual); volochobnïye and v'yunishnïye songs (Easter carols); the April egor'evskiye (St George's Day songs), the semitskiye (sung the Thursday before the Russian Trinity) and troitskiye (Whitsunday) songs, called may'skiye in the Smolensk region; the kupal'skiye songs sung on the day of the summer solstice (23 June); and the zhnivnïye songs, accompanying the harvest.

Ex.2 Rhythmic structures, Russian calendar songs

The magical invocation of a rich harvest had an important function in the folklore of the agrarian calendar. There is even a saying: 'The spring song ends in the autumn'. The link in melodic intonation between the work songs and the ritual calendar songs of harvest is fundamental, for it shows the unity of the musical vocabulary used by the agriculturalist during the entire work year. The formulaic character of the tunes, usually short, also contributed to this, as each one could be combined with many different texts of analogous function. Thus, for example, all the vesnyanki in one local tradition might be performed to one melody. Sometimes the people did not consider them to be real songs: they said 'vesnu zaklikayet' ('one calls for spring to come') and not 'poyot vesnyanku' ('one sings a vesnyanka'). Here, music does not yet have an exclusively aesthetic function. The singing, ritual movements, dances and even ritual laughter were called upon to intrude actively in life, to act upon it in a necessary or useful way. It is impossible to understand the musical meaning, the structure or the style of performance of calendar songs without a thorough understanding of the essence of calendar rituals and their syncretism. For example, the necessarily loud singing of the carnival songs which were part of the ritual burial of Maslenitsa (Shrovetide) was required to help bring about a good harvest. Equally necessary were the rhythmic movements accompanying the song (walking, running, hopping, striking a stick on the ground or against something, etc.) and the many ritual syncretic song-dances with magical functions.

The motive force in calendar songs is also reflected in their musical structure, especially in their rhythm. Hence the large number of stereotyped rhythmic formulae, combined with various scalar structures different local musics. ( Exx.2 and 3 show rhythmic and scalar structures of Russian calendar songs.) Another important attribute of calendar songs is the refrain. Refrain cries include 'Kolyada!', 'Ta Usen'!', 'Svyat vechor!', 'Vesna-krasna na ves' svet!', 'Oy, mayu, mayu zeleniy!', 'Kupala na Ivana!' etc. In group singing the refrains are always performed by the chorus.

In 1969, Lobanov discovered a new traditional genre of 'forest-calls' or vocal melody-signals (see Lobanov, 1996). This genre belongs to north-western Russia and is still preserved in the living tradition of Novgorod, Vologda, St Petersburg, Tver, Archangel and Pskov regions. It may be classified into two types: ukanie ('halloos') are exclaimed in the head register of the voice using the vowel 'u', mainly by women while gathering berries and mushrooms; goikanie or geikanie ('heying') are exclaimed in the chest register using 'ae' or 'o', mainly by male herdsmen. In the Novgorod region hallooing is often performed on the Thursday before Easter.

(c) Wedding songs. Songs of various genres belong to this group: lyric songs, performed before going to the altar at the devichnik (the evening party preceding the wedding); glorifying songs or pripevaniya performed before and after going to the altar; wedding laments, performed only before the altar ceremony, and not found in all regional traditions; and ritual or 'main' songs (called 'formula songs' in current Russian research). The melodies of the latter are sung with various texts during all the basic stages of the wedding ritual. The ritual itself is more or less common to the entire Russian territory. However, two main types of weddings are known among the Russian peasantry: joyful and 'funeral' type weddings. The former are typical of the western and southern parts of European Russia; the latter of the north. Consequently, songs of the former are stylistically related to calendrical songs and link Russian wedding ritual to those of other Slavic peoples; and songs for the latter to funeral laments of different local traditions. Group lamenting at weddings shares many of the features of song, but is understood as lamenting by the peasants themselves, as is reflected in their folksong terminology.

Musically, the wedding is usually divided sharply into two unequal parts – before and after the marriage ceremony. The songs sung before it in some regions (e.g. in the Vologda region) bear the general name of prichotï (laments). In such cases there may not be any special melody for the songs of glorification, and this is expressed in the folk terminology: the father-in-law is not 'glorified' or sung to but 'oprichitïvayut' ('they lament him'). Glorifying songs are sung to all the participants in the wedding, including children, to whom joking songs of praise are sung. The guests 'sing forth' (pripevayut) to a person on behalf of another person, for example, to the bride on behalf of the groom, or to a girl on behalf of a bachelor wedding guest who is courting her. A summary of the Russian wedding is impossible, as no two Russian villages have exactly the same rituals; but differences in wedding rituals and songs are the clearest indicators available of the local dialects of Russian folk music.

Wedding laments, usually with a one-phrase structure with apocope at the end of the line (ex.4), are often closely related to funeral laments. Sometimes they are differentiated functionally during the wedding: at first the laments are relatively restrained, of a generalized character, but at the crucial moment of the ritual the bride changes the melody, falls to the ground and laments na myortviy golos

('in the voice of the dead'), that is, in the melody of the funeral lament (see Ushakov, 1907). A special type of wedding lament occurs when the bride laments against a background of a group lament or a choral song, forming a complex polytonal, polyrhythmic composition (see for example Zemtsovsky, Toropetskiye pesni, 1967, no.49, and 1972, no.22; Banin, 1973, p.136).

Lyric wedding songs are, on the whole, close to non-ritual songs (see below), although they have some particular features and their structure is simpler. An exception is formed by certain Russian wedding songs such as the orphan song Tï reka li moya rechen'ka ('You river, my little riverlet'; in Zemtsovsky, Toropetskiye pesni, 1967, no.43), or Trubon'ka ('Little horn'; in Zemtsovsky, 1974, no.37). Musically they are the most distinctively Russian lyric songs, having essentially no analogy with those of neighbouring peoples. Examples in Rimsky-Korsakov (1876, 4/1951), nos.75, 89 and others, and in Lyadov (1959), nos.81, 90 and others, show a particular melodic type of wedding lyric song based on an original plagal mode with a stereotyped turn in the second half of the melody. There are not many such songs, but they are indispensable to the Russian wedding (ex.5). Lyric wedding songs often display intonational and rhythmic links with wedding songs of other genres, but are distinguished from them usually by their modal changeability. (For greater detail on wedding lyric songs, see P'yankova, 1973.)

The most archaic traditions have a minimum of formula melodies, sung throughout the wedding (which lasts a week, on average). In the eastern parts of the Vologda region, for example, there are weddings that employ a single melody formula, which changes during the ritual only in tempo, from slow at the beginning to fast at the end. On the shores of the White Sea there are weddings with two formula melodies, which are distributed either between the stages of the ritual or between the parties of the groom and the bride (Lapin, 1974). There are weddings in which up to five melodies are sung throughout. These are sung at many stages of the ritual with various texts, although other non-formula songs (i.e. songs with an individual melody) are also sung.

In general, the chief distinction of wedding songs lies not in modal or scalar forms, which are often like those of calendar songs, but in their general structure, and above all in rhythm. A remarkable feature of Russian folk music is the fact that the most complex development of rhythm appears not in dance music (as it does in the Balkans, for example) but in the wedding formula melodies. Furthermore, their rhythm also differs from the asymmetrical rhythm of non-ritual lyric songs (see below). The specific character of the wedding formula melodies rests on extremely stable rhythmic and metrical stereotypes with internally complex structure, as for example: 6/8 4/8 (5 + 3)/8 (see Zemtsovsky, Toropetskiy pesni, 1967, no.25 and others); (3 + 8)/8 (6 + 2)/8 3/4, etc. Lapin has shown that wedding formulae have an irregular metre, with a constant asymmetrical and hypnotically fascinating fast alternation between duple and triple units, for instance (3 + 3 + 2)/8 (3 + 2 + 2)/8 (3 + 2 + 3 + 3)/8 (2 + 2)/8. This kind of rhythmo-metric structure of a two-phrase musical formula is sung to various texts at a White Sea wedding (ex.6). In general, the most widespread rhythm of Russian wedding songs is quintuple, both pure and in various combinations, with 5 + 3 especially frequent. For five-syllable and nine-syllable text lines, the internal structure is usually divided in two (aa; ab + ab; also abb; more rarely aba). A typological classification of wedding formula melodies has been proposed by P'yankova (1972).

(d) Other songs of family life. Other songs include christening songs on a child's birth (rodinnye), found primarily on the Belarusian border, as well as feast songs sung at the christening; other children's songs such as lullabies (bayul'nïye, bayki), game songs, poteshki (entertaining songs), draznilki (usually joking rhymes with personal names), sung tales and songs which are part of tales; and funeral laments (plachi, prichotï, pricheti, vopli, zaplachki).

Children's game chants are performed within a range rarely exceeding a 4th. Their most typical scalar structures are a′–c″–d″ and g′–a′–c″, which are internationally known. Their rhythm is simple, starting from a basic four-beat line and from dance patterns. A double four-beat trochaic line is typical of lullabies. Their melodies are usually based on a trichord spanning a minor 3rd, sometimes with the addition of a 4th below or other nearby passing notes. Their even rocking rhythm and some of their texts are evidence not only of the everyday function of bayukan'ye (lulling the child) but also of the old magical power of lullabies (the function of protecting the child from evil spirits and death itself). Later lullaby texts are called kolïbel'nïye by the people themselves, as they distinguish them from the ancient bayul'nïye songs. It is also no accident that the scalar structure and one-line form of lullabies and calendar songs concide (when they have supertonic cadences (ex.7). This musical feature seems to show that agrarian and family rites are close in their intrinsic meaning.

Prichitaniya (laments) once had an important place in the Russian village: they were performed not only at weddings and funerals, but also when the young men were taken into the tsarist army, and generally for any long separation or illness, or for funeral wakes. According to Propp (1964, p.69) there are three genres of lament: two are ritual (wedding and funeral), and one non-ritual (for recruits, in wartime, and linked with the various misfortunes of old peasant life). Musically they differ in different regions: there may be one musical formula for all the types of lament, or two, usually to be distinguished by the degree of melodic development. In north Russia lyrico-epic laments with extended texts predominate, related in style to the heroic songs. In other regions the laments are shorter, and the melodic form is either more developed or more declamatory.

Paradoxically, the musical and poetic language of the laments is always stable and stereotyped. Their basic scalar structures and some of their rhythmic patterns are also found in calendar and wedding songs and, in the north of Russia, in epic songs. The predominant scalar structures are based on descending 3rds and 4ths with a variable 3rd (major, minor, neutral) and 2nd, the latter tending towards the minor 2nd. Quite often there is also a 4th below the tonic. The rhythmic pattern is linked to the verse: there are long epic lines in the north and eight- or nine-syllable lines in central Russian regions, performed in recitative manner without melisma. The metrical structure of the verse in the classic form of the lament is trochaic with a dactylic ending, with four to seven syllables in each line, which is syntactically complete. The rhythm and scalar structure are stereotyped, as is their general composition: the melody itself is a definite crystallized formula. The musical phrase is often shorter than the verse line, necessitating apocope: the words are not sung all the way through, the endings being swallowed as though in tears. The performance of laments in many local traditions is difficult to notate: they are on the borderline between musical and physical weeping and move easily from one to the other. Other features are: many descending glissandos (between notes and during abrupt changes of register) increasing from line to line; a gradual raising (most common) or lowering of the tessitura; a tense voice quality, often with vibrato; rubato and unmeasured rests; and alternations of musical exclamations with rhythmic speech, cries, moans, natural sobbing, etc. The lament is mostly performed as a solo improvisation for a specific occasion on the basis of traditional musical and poetic formulae. Russian village women learn the art in their youth. Outstanding peasant 'lamenters' in the north became famous, for example the voplennitsa from the Trans-Onega region (east of Lake Onega) IRINA FEDOSOVA (1831–99), from whom more than 30,000 lines of funeral, recruit and wedding laments were collected. In other traditions every woman knew how to lament. Group and choral lamenting is also known (at weddings, and also on memorial days in the cemetery).

(e) Lyric song. The narrow understanding of 'lyric' as the expression of intimate personal feelings is unacceptable in the folkloric context. Lyric folklore expresses the feelings of the entire people. The lyric song in general is not a genre of folklore but a basic type of artistic creation (along with epic and dramatic; see Propp, 1964, p.67). Nevertheless, in Russian folk music the lyric song can be considered a particular genre, not linked to ritual or dramatic use and characterized by a stable correlation of melody and text. There are various musical forms of lyric songs in Russian folk music, from simple monodic 'sketches' to the broadly developed polyphonic protyazhnïye (long-drawn-out) songs. Though much has been written on lyric song, there are no synthesizing studies on the genre as a whole. There are two important points. First, the peasant lyric song in its everyday occurrence is more complex than the above definition of the lyric genre suggests: lyric songs may be free from any ritual, or may in part be drawn into a ritual (e.g. a wedding), into a khorovod, or into the repertory of calendar festivals and winter evening work parties (posidelki), especially in south-western regions (e.g. the Smolensk region: see Pavlova, 1969). When a lyric song performance is linked with a specific function there may be changes in some elements of its musical style (for example, a deformation of the cadence). Secondly, lyric songs are the most dynamic genres in Russian traditional music, historically, geographically and stylistically. Still unfettered by ritual application for the most part, they travel easily with the population, and in new conditions may take on supradialectical features, leading to a creative interpenetration of musical styles and stylistic variants with a song – a characteristic phenomenon (see ex.7). Lyric songs would repay diachronic and synchronic study. Where an archaic style is found (with a short strophe, a narrow range of a 4th or 5th, or a declamatory basis) it is not regarded as such and fully satisfies the musical demands of the modern performers. The lyric song has brought to Russian folk music a wealth of musical forms and new expressive means. The most developed – the polyphonic forms of the expansive protyazhnaya lyric song – evolved during the formation of the Russian nation (14th–17th centuries, Muscovite Rus′) and, being a symbol of Russian national culture as a whole, became Russia's national pride.

Part-singing is found in all Russian folk music, but is most characteristic of lyric songs, where it has reached its highest development in podgolosochnaya (descant) polyphony. The growth of part-singing was accompanied and aided by the tonic stress of the early Russian syllabic folk verse line (governed by the number of syllables, not by stress patterns), leading to the form of 8-, 9- or 13-syllable lines with five to seven unstressed syllables – which is the raspetïy stikh (extended verse line) of the polyphonic protyazhnaya song (terms used by Gippius and Rudneva). The raspetïy line is characterized by frequent interruptions of words (apocope) followed by subsequent repeats, and by various inserted particles, interjections, exclamations (not only between words but also in the middle of a word) and linking syllables. The strophic form used is the 'chain opening': at the beginning of each strophe a fragment is repeated from the last line of the preceding strophe, without any meaningful link with the new strophe. The raspetïy or extended line corresponds to an 'extended' melody with intrasyllabic melodies: an entire musical phrase may be sung to a single syllable of a song text. These phrases based on one syllable are not optional ornaments but an organic structural unit. The melodic extension of the syllables and the long notes slow down the sung speech and transfer the emphasis from verse to music; the emotional power of the music is dominant, revealing feelings not expressed by the words.

Melodically the extended lyric song is always based on the development and establishment of a single melodic unit, usually that of a 4th or a 5th. In some songs this basic unit of intonation is distinctly stated in the zapev (introduction) of the song as its 'intonational thesis', while in others it is expounded differently; it is always present but it has no structurally outlined exposition. An 'intonational thesis' is not a theme for development (motivic, variational, sequential), rather the musical phrases flow out one from the other, adding to it or developing it further (by expanding its range, scale rhythm, texture) on the basis of specific musical rules (see Zemtsovsky, Russkaya protazhnaya pesnya, 1967). This organic growth, seemingly deliberate and non-periodic, has great internal energy and intensifying force. The style of musical development is different in different dialects, but the most distinct are in the musical dialects north and south of Moscow. In the north the vodit′ golosom style ('with part-writing') – majestic, even choral singing with minimal separation of the leading soloist – is characteristic. By contrast, in the south there is resonant stylish singing with the role of the leading soloist accentuated, in a style called kachat' golos ('to swing the voice'). In the north a choral song is said to be 'raised' (na golosa podnimayut), in the south 'tightened' (styagivayut), as distinct from khorovod and wedding songs, which are 'played' (igrayut).

The basic varieties of Russian folk polyphony are heterophony and descant (podgolosochnaya) polyphony. More rarely found are the vtora, parallel movement of voices, or elements of chordal harmonic structure. At key points in the form, principally at cadences, all the voices lead to a choral unison (or octave). In the Trans-Baikal region in Siberia these are called svodï ('collections'). The number of voice-parts in the chorus and the number of singers to each part are flexible and may change during the performance of a song; the voices cross freely, and one part may divide into two. The function of the leading voice can be transferred from the leading soloist to another singer. Usually the words are pronounced by all the voices synchronously, but exceptions occur, as in the Voronezh region, where the descant is sung without any words, as pure vocalization, while in the Ryazan region the lower group of singers may not always pronounce all the words: the group basit (acts as a bass) on long notes. When there is a clear division of registers between the parts, the voices cross only within the parts (in south Russian styles). However, the greatest development of polyphonic form is linked everywhere with the highest development of melisma, which is found in the north, central and south Russian dialects. Some north-western and south-western regions that did not experience strong Muscovite influence between the 14th century and the 16th do not have such highly developed forms of polyphonic singing and represent more archaic styles of Russian folk choral singing.

The lyric song arose and was developed not only among peasants working the land but also among those in other situations; it arose among the urban propertied class, the students and finally the proletariat of long standing. Each social group and sub-group of Russian society had its own lyric songs, and each brought something new to their development. After peasant lyric song, the most important branch is the urban song. The influences on its music were various: the old peasant song; new musical instruments with harmonic possibilities (the guitar and the piano); military band music and European dances, introduced during the reign of Peter I; the three-part harmony of the secular kant (in urban Russia from about 1680, for some 150 years, kant came to designate religious psalms, panegyric 'vivats' and lyric songs; the numerous collections of kantï, many in manuscripts with musical notation in three parts, also contain some of the earliest notations of folksongs); the link with professional music and poetry; Gypsy singing (see Shteynpress, 1934); and vaudeville. In place of the syncretism of peasant song, melodies began more and more to be composed to an existing text, with the addition of a simple guitar improvisation. As urban life evolved, songbooks with music appeared, at first in manuscript, then printed, from the end of the 18th century. Variability diminished correspondingly. Any popular melodies (including operatic arias) were used as settings for favourite verses and the tunes were unintentionally reworked, their basic melodic pattern being gradually changed.

The role of Gypsy musicians in Russian culture should be reconsidered. Historically Gypsy (Roma) musicians have played a significant part as professional musicians throughout Europe. Since the end of the 18th century and especially in the 19th the Russian Gypsies, according to Petr Bessonov (1874) 'were mediators between "society" and the "high classes" from the one hand, and the simple folk of the "lowest stratum" from the other hand. They transferred folksongs from below upwards and other verses from above downwards' (Druskin, SovM, 1934, pp.96–105, esp. 100). As a result, the highly emotional Gypsy vocal style and wordless vocal 'tap dance', together with their seven-string guitar with its unusual style of improvisation and harmonization and, above all, the chords they used, literally struck a deep chord in Russian hearts. This heart-rending style of performance of Russian songs, even when not Gypsy songs, has become a unique phenomenon in Russian culture. This was hinted at in 1806 by an anonymous author (probably Nikolay L'vov) in the preface to A Collection of Russian Folk Songs with their Tunes Set to Music by Ivan Prach, who wrote:

> Among the 'pliasovye' [dance] songs there are also particular ones known as Gypsy song, more because of the manner of singing them than their construction, because onle these songs can be danced to in the Gypsy style . . . There is no doubt that Gypsy songs too were composed by Russians. Outside of Russia, Gypsy singing and dancing are quite different and in no way resemble the dancing and singing of the Russian Gypsies. One must supppose that the latter took from our songs that which was most appropriate, and having added to it the greater liveliness of their singing made the songs incomparably more suitable for fast pantomime dance, which if one examines it carefully, is nothing but the Russian 'kozelskaia pliaska' accelerated and enlivened by quick movements, which express more passion. In the simple folk 'pliasovye' songs there is less melody than in the Gypsy ones. In the latter there is more gaity and there are some particular sayings which are enunciated by the dancers, such as 'Oi zhgi, govori' ['Oi burn, tell'] and the like. [L'vov and Prach, 1987, pp.8–81]

The folklore of Russian peasants still keeps alive much of their Gypsy repertory dating from the beginning of the 19th century, including some extremely popular dances and songs, such as 'Barynia' ('Lady', 'Mistress') which has been in popular song books since 1799 as a Gypsy song, 'Seni' (the hallway of a traditional Russian hut), 'Tsïganochka' ('Little Gypsy Girl'), and so on. There has been a process of Gypsy instrumentation of Russian tunes, choral orchestration and harmonization. Even the traditional polyphony of the Russian peasants was adjusted wherever possible by Gypsies to the functional harmonic thinking of classical Western European music. In general, the Gypsy interpretation of Russian folksongs became the beginning of their 'translation' into the Western European musical language. More than just a performative style, it was also a structural transformation. From the 1850s, the publication of Gypsy songs for voice and piano began in Moscow and St Petersburg. In Russian musical life, a new phenomenon appeared, that is, the musical style of 'romalesca'. Since that time, it has apparently been possible to differentiate between 'Gypsy song' and the stylized and sentimental 'Gypsy-like' song (Rus. 'tsïganshchina'). Similarly, Ukrainian music adopted in Russia, that is 'malorossiyskie pesni' ('Little-Russian songs'), which became very popular, bore almost no resemblance to 'genuine' Ukrainian folksong.

Throughout the 19th century songs of the Russian liberation movement were composed. At first they contributed something new only in poetic content (revolutionary texts were sung to folk melodies), but gradually songs were composed with new independent melodies and texts, and using a musical language unusual for Russian folklore: combining of emotional declamation and a fervent refrain. In 1905 the revolutionary song emerged from underground and was sung in the streets for the first time; marching songs, hymns and procession songs such as Smelo, tovarishchi, v nogu or Vï zhertvoyu pali were sung during mass demonstrations and assemblies. From the towns these songs later reached the villages where they were adapted slowly but eventually took root. The active interchange of urban and peasant, soldier and revolutionary lyrical songs was the basis for the development of their new modern forms.

(f) Epics. The vast heterogeneous area of narrative folklore includes bïlinï (discussed below), dukhovnïye stikhi (spiritual songs), skomoroshinï (songs of the medieval buffoons), older historical songs and ballads (for more detail see Propp, 1964). Strictly speaking, with the exception of the bïlinï, these types are not separate musical genres, for each has several genre forms. Epic themes existed at various epochs and differed in various local traditions in musical performance, appearing for example in the style and form of bïlinï, dance or game dance-songs, soldier or lyrical songs, and even work songs or ritual songs. The musical features of some of these, for example of the ballad, have not developed to the point of having the characteristics of an independent musical genre. (This is one of the many differences between the Russian folk ballad and those of western Europe and America.) Since the problem of the musical character of Russian narrative folk music as a whole is still unsettled and relatively neglected, this discussion is limited to a characterization of the most important and best-defined genre within it – that of the bïlinï ('what is was'; or starina, 'old song' in folk terminology).

The total number of published texts of bïlinï is about 2500, while the number of different subjects lies between 110 and 120, but publications of their music are far fewer. Most bïlinï surviving in oral peasant tradition belong to the Kiev or Vladimir cycle, recounting the ancient heroic deeds of the Russian bogatïri (heroes) such as Il'ya Muromets, Dobrïnya Nikitich and Alyosha Popovich. They embody the people's historic dreams of state unity and of the independence of their homeland in the feudal period. The bïlina has a distinct verse, a stereotyped cadence, a compositionally related beginning and ending, but no special definitive musical content in terms of pitch design. The earliest collections of bïlinï were made in the 17th and 18th centuries. The first manuscript collection of bïlinï with melodies (by Kirsha Danilov) is datable to the middle of the 18th century; the living tradition of the epic in Russia was discovered and noted at the beginning of the second half of the 19th century in the Russian north, by P.N. Rïbnikov and A.F. Hilferding, while the first sound recordings of bïlinï were made at the end of the 19th.

According to their manner of performance bïlinï are usually divided into two types: those with solo recitative singing (found primarily in the north) and those with choral singing in parts (chiefly in the south among the Don and Terek Cossacks). In style the latter are close to south Russian lyric songs. The northern tradition itself is heterogeneous (for example, along the Pinega River the bïlinï are choral, along the Pechora they are sung by a two-part ensemble), while recitative performance is also known in the south along the Don River. South and central Russian songs with bïlina images in their texts can be related to bïlinï under certain conditions, but strictly speaking the centre of the bïlinï remains the north of Russia.

The bïlinï of the Trans-Onega region, with few melodies known, clearly belong to a relatively late tradition; in many ways they are unique and cannot be considered generally Russian or even generally north Russian. These melodies consist of several lines with a heightening of the tension of the verse line, so that the text is divided not into lines but stanzas. Every musical stanza consists of two (or rarely three) melodic lines: initial and repeated. Usually the latter is repeated as the logic of the text demands, accentuating complete sections of the narrative (according to the formula ABB or ABCC). Another local tradition of the northern bïlinï that is not archaic in style is found along the Karelian coast. Here couplet bïlinï are found, with songlike stanzas.

Vasil'yeva (1976) has shown only one bïlina form to be widespread: the one-line melody, which corresponds to a single verse line. (The oldest are those along the Mezen' River, but they are also found on the Kuloy and Pinega rivers, in the Pudozh area, in the region east of Lake Onega in general and on the southern coast of the White Sea.) The classic collection of one-line bïlinï is Grigor'yev's three-volume Arkhangel'skiye bïlinï (notated from phonograph recordings by I.S. Tezavrovsky made in the Arkhangel'sk government in 1899–1901). They are in additive metre with accents at the beginning and at the cadence, with a typical bar structure of (3 + 4)/4 or 11/8; the chief feature, however, is the required rhythmic stress of the close. The last three syllables, which form the cadence, either stand apart syntactically (as in the north-east of the bïlina tradition, including the area along the Pechora river), or they are distinguished by a weighting of the metric unit (e.g. a crotchet in place of a quaver), in other words, by a slowing down of the movement of the melody (ex.8). It is the cadence, corresponding to the close of the poetic line, that is the striking feature of the bïlina melos and the most important factor in creating its form. Rhythmic equalization of the cadence transforms a bïlina into a skomoroshina, essentially an anti-bïlina. In the latter, the 12- to 14-syllable line with three basic stresses (called 'the full epic scale') is changed into an 8- to 11-syllable line with two basic stresses which is the skomorokh line, a recitative fast patter. In turn, a change in the function of the beginning of the line (the anacrusis), the second most important element of the bïlina melody, in such a way as to emphasize the beginning of the melody, makes the bïlina into a lyric song (as in the repertory of the Pechora region, for example). The compositional features of the one-line bïlinï that have been mentioned belong to various melodic types.

Essentially, bïlinï, in terms of musical intonation, have never become a distinct musical genre. However, the traditional way of performing bïlina, literally 'to tell' it, is a unique form of musical narration. The bïlina has a distinct verse, a stereotyped cadence, a compositionally related beginning and ending, but no special definitive musical content in terms of pitch design. Maslov (1911) observed that 'most bïlina melodies are a reworking of turns and tunes long known by the people, packed together in a definite rhythm worked out for bïlinï (p.325). Melodies that are linked melodically with other song genres (laudatory wedding songs, lyric khorovod and dance-songs) make up a considerable group of bïlina tunes. The bïlina 'reworking' of song melodies takes place within the limits of a type of intonation specific to bïlinï. The combination of the 'flight of quavers' and the tranquil solid 'singing forth' of three crotchets in the cadence creates a particularly lively structure: mobile speech (the 'utterance' of the verse) returns periodically, at the end of each verse line, to a conventional narrative, demanding also a measured singing, usually based on the framework of a 4th. This type of intonation creates a conventional form (almost a formula) of the bïlina melos, which can be observed in principle in various modal-melodic traditions. The performers also distinguish the bïlinï in terminology: 'I will tell you, brothers, but I won't tell a tale, I won't sing a song, but I'll sing you an ancient verse, a Kievan bïlina' (Astakhova, 1938–51, ii, 394).

The fixed association of certain melodies with certain texts is not known in the northern bïlinï. The starinshchik (the performer of bïlinï) can perform his entire repertory of bïlinï to one or two melodies or he may use a different melody when he repeats a bïlina. There are melodies common to a whole region. The melodies do not convey poetic images but dispose the listener to receive them, and then, by concentrating the attention on the content of the bïlinï, they lead the audience into their special artistic world.

(iii) Dance. Tanets is a general term covering all types of folk dance, which at first was associated with ritual work songs, especially those connected with the calendar cycle. In modern practice their old associations with the seasons and with particular venues (on the street, at home, in the meadow or the forest glade) are being forgotten and the dances are mixed together. However, there has been a certain lack of clarity in differentiation for a long time: the same song has been recorded in various places as a khorovod, a dramatic dance-song or a plyaska. Songs of other genres have also crossed over into the category of khorovod and plyaska songs, changing their structure accordingly. Purer types of these various song categories do exist, however, connected with particular choreographic movements. The texts cover a wide range of subjects (e.g. working themes, family relationships, social satire etc.).

The khorovod, igrovïye dances (dramatic or game dances, similar to the English 'London Bridge is falling down') and individual plyaski were apparently slow to take form as independent genres. They are distinguished not so much by melodic content (being close to the song melodies of other genres such as calendar, wedding and lyric songs) as by their structure and rhythm, directly connected with the corresponding type of movement (pantomime, couple-dance etc.). This is reflected in the indigenous folk terms: krugovïye (in a circle), gulebnïye (holiday walking songs), khodovïye (walking), igrishchnïye (grand game songs), stenka na stenku (a line of youths moving towards a line of girls), skakul'nïye (jumping songs).

The khorovod is most typically a girls' circle-dance, the performers moving from right to left (the direction of the sun) and singing, with individuals inside the circle acting out the subject of the song. Young men may also take part. The khorovod can also be a formation dance, with dancers in rows facing each other, or in columns, figures of eight etc. Khorovod dances and khorovod processions are mass dances. In the spring khorovodï between 200 and 300 people may take part, usually girls. They are led (vodyat), people walk (khodyat) in them, and there is even a folk expression khodit' pesni, 'to walk songs'. All the dancers make the same movements and sing and dance at the same time. Circle and figure khorovodï are differentiated by the character of their movements, as, for example, zmeykoy ('like a snake'), gus'kom (single file), rucheykom ('in a stream', walking in rows of four or more), veryovochkoy (similar to zmeykoy or ulitsey), ulitsey ('along the road'), cherez vorottsa (when couples hold hands high and other dancers pass underneath) or stenoy ('along the wall'). The circle-dance melodies have a cyclic structure. In dramatic khorovodï the singers stand in a circle inside which a scene is acted, the leading singer singing the basic text and the chorus singing the refrain. The melodies of these and of the figured khorovodï are strophic, for instance AABB, ABAB or ABBA.

Khorovod dances also have divided melodies with a fixed caesura corresponding to the verse line: 4 + 3 + 3 as in 'A mï proso/seyali/seyali' ('We were sowing millet') or 5 + 3 + 3 as in 'Kak vo gorode/tsarevna/tsarevna' ('There was an empress in the town'). Many khorovod melodies have refrains such as 'Oy li oy lyuli' or 'Oy lyushen'ki lyuli'. Characteristic is a four-line strophe whose fourth line is a repetition of the second. When a khorovod is performed the dance may span three or four songs sung to the same melody. Such melodic formulae are found especially in vecherochnïye (evening) songs, whose function is close to the wedding laudatory songs (the pripevaniya, sung by the young man to the girl).

Plyaski differ from khorovodï in choreography and musical structure. The former is primarily an individual dance, predominantly for men, although women also dance singly. At best the dancer interacts with his immediate partner, but his movements are independent of the other dancers (if there are any). The dancers of a plyaska themselves do not sing: the onlookers sing to them. In contrast to the circle khorovodï, the melodies of the plyaski do not have complicated contradictory rhythms, but are always based upon short repeating rhythmic figures, usually with stress at the ends of phrases or off the beat (ex.9 shows plyaska rhythmic formulae).

Ex.9 Typical rhythmic formulae found in plyaski

In these dances polyrhythm is possible between the melody and the choreography. Plyaski are definable as a special genre only when considered as a whole: musically or textually they do not really constitute a separate genre. For example, the plyaska may be accompanied by a humorous text without a plot; various ideas and images may be linked together at random. The duration of the texts thus assembled depends solely on how long the dancers want to dance. A plyaska may also be performed to an endlessly repeated series of meaningless words, which have the function of an accompanying instrument. In general, khorovodï and plyaski with instrumental accompaniment (by solo instruments or ensembles) are a common occurrence in Russian folk music.

(iv) Chastushki. The chastushka is a vocal-instrumental genre consisting of short, single-stanza couplets; these usually have four lines (more rarely two or six), are rhymed, and are linked with the old dance (plyasovaya) song and the humorous pripevki (see above) of fair, carnival and wedding joke-makers (draznilki). The crystallization of chastushki as a specific genre with unlimited subject matter took place in post-Reform Russia (i.e. in the last third of the 19th century), being linked with the destruction of the old village organization, and the growing demand in folklore for swift up-to-date critical statements about the new life pattern and human relations. The division of chastushki from traditional pripevki is very clear; the spread of the accordion into the village (*c*1830–60) may have influenced the fact that pripevki began to be performed not only with the dance. The rhythmic kinship of all chastushki (usually with a structure of 8 + 7 + 8 + 7 syllables in trochaic tetrameters) contributed to their easy dissemination and to the combination of many texts with one melody (or with any melody belonging to one type). 'Chastushki' (from the adjective chastïy: 'quick') is not the only term used: in different dialects it may be called pripevki, pribaski, korotushki, prigudki; with the dance, the taratorki, priplyaski; with promenading, khodovïye etc. Stradan'ya ('sufferings') are a variety of chastushka that is expanded melodically, often in two lines (with 8 + 8 syllables), found in the Volga and Voronezh areas. The neskladï ('nonsense songs') are chastushki without rhyme, particularly nonsensical ones. Those called pod yazïk ('under the tongue') or rotovushki (from rot: 'mouth') are performed to a vocal accompaniment which imitates an instrument (similar to mouth-music in Scotland). Chastushki are usually performed with an accordion or balalaika. The predominant melodic type is an extremely varied and expressive recitative. The instrumental accompaniment gives much scope to a talented improviser. Since the 1920s there has been a vigorous development in the playing of instrumental variations on the accordion accompanying the chastushka. Sometimes there is polyrhythm between voice and accompaniment, when the ostinato formula of the latter is not dependent on the vocal phrasing (ex.10).

Chastushki may be performed solo, as a duet (often in the form of a dialogue between friends, called singing na otvet: 'to an answer'), or by a chorus with or without instrumental accompaniment; they may be performed to a dance, to walking, or simply as a lyric expression. Some forms of chastushki are found among all Russians, others (such as the stradan'ya) only in certain areas; others appear to be unique in form, such as the spasovskiye, which have various repetitions of words expanding the strophe to 8 + 11 + 8 + 11 syllables. An example of chastushki that are original in form and performance style are those sung in the villages along the River Oyati (in the St Petersburg region), called kachel'nïye ('on the swings'), pokosnïye ('reaping'), zhnivnïye ('harvest') and lesnïye ('forest'); they are linked with the agricultural calendar and convey a special feeling for the landscape that cannot be conveyed in transcription (ex.11).

Northern, central and south Russian regional chastushka styles differ also in melody and style of singing. The interrelation of melody and text is not always arbitrary: the performance of a cycle of chastushki related to each other in meaning is known, and there are stable groups of texts, such as those called semyonovna, yablochko ('little apple'), tsïganochka ('little Gypsy girl') and podgornaya ('foothill'). Reliable musical transcriptions were made only after the communist revolution (e.g. 11 chastushka melodies in the collection by Gippius and Eval'd, 1937, and the Academy collection Chastushki v zapisyakh sovetskovo vremeni, 1965).

(v) Instrumental music. Instrumental music is the least studied aspect of Russian folk music; in general Russian folk music is nearly always associated with the vocal tradition. Scholarly publications on instruments have appeared primarily since 1960. Centuries of persecution by the church against folk instruments played a crucial role in their fate. Shepherds' instruments, which were best preserved, are gradually disappearing with the change in the life of the shepherd. Nevertheless, the most recent research by folk instrument specialists in various regions of the Russian Federation have been very fruitful, even going as far as discovering hitherto unknown musical instruments.

Folk instruments of the four basic types (idiophones, membranophones, aerophones and chordophones) are used by the Russians in solo and ensemble performance. The best known aerophones include the dudka, also called the sopel' or pïzhatka, a duct flute made of maple, bird-cherry or willow, between about 30 and 40 cm long with five or six finger-holes. It has a range of a 6th or 7th, and with overblowing up to two and a half octaves. The zhaleyka (rozhok, bryolka) is a pastoral single-reed instrument made of willow or elder, about 15 cm long, with a bell (rastrub) of cow horn or birch bark at the lower end. It has three to seven finger-holes, producing a diatonic scale. Zhaleyki with one pipe are found in the north, double ones in the southern regions. When 'rozhok' does not designate a zhaleyka, it is a shepherd's horn, made of birch bark, maple or juniper, between 40 and 50 cm long with four or five finger-holes and an additional hole on the underside. There is also a shepherd's rog (horn) made of animal horn or wood with a mouthpiece but no finger-holes, 90–100 cm long. Signals and simple diatonic melodies are played on it.

The kuviklï or kugiklï are panpipes, a woman's instrument, played in the south-western regions. They consist of two to five stopped reed pipes of the same diameter but of various lengths (10–16 cm). Dance-tunes are usually played on kuviklï with five pipes, while those with three or four pipes are played in ensemble as accompanying instruments. The usual ensemble of performers (kugikal'nitsï) consists of three or four women (see Rudneva, 1975, pp.141ff). One or two play the pipes, at the same time producing sounds with the voice similar to those of the pipes, a device known as fifkan'ye. The other two women accompany the basic tune with harmony notes in syncopation. Each set of pipes played by one performer is known as a 'pair', regardless of the actual number of pipes: the commonest number is five. They are usually tuned to a pentachord containing a neutral 3rd.

The string instruments include the skripka (fiddle); formerly home-made but now usually bought mass-produced (the home-made ones often have three strings, tuned in 4ths); the gusli, a kind of psaltery with five to 14 strings tuned diatonically, found mainly in the north-west in the Pskov area; and the balalaika. Another shepherds' instrument is the baraban (drum). More modern instruments now in use are the seven-string guitar, the accordion and the bayan (a type of accordion introduced in 1907, with a chromatic keyboard and chord buttons).

Folk instruments are mostly used either by shepherds or for the accompaniment of dances and songs, including ritual songs. Instruments used by shepherds are the flute, zhaleyka and the 'natural trumpet'; the accordion and balalaika are used for dancing. Some pastoral tunes are purely instrumental: the Yaroslav zhaleyka for example, has two finger-holes and a scale of four whole tones; it cannot be used to play song- or dance-melodies. Other pastoral instruments, such as the rozhok, can be used to play signals (e.g. to bring the herd together) as well as songs and dance-tunes. When the rozhok accompanies choral singing it doubles one of the vocal parts. The khor rozhechnikov (chorus of horn players) was a well-known group, whose playing in many parts was first notated by Yu.N. Mel'gunov in 1879. From the end of the 19th century the horn ensemble also performed with an accordion. The repertory of instrumental ensembles is based on folksongs, transformed in various ways. During performance the melody and text of a song is 'reconceived', becoming a kind of theme with variations. On the other hand, the playing of dance-tunes does not have to conform to a text and is thus more original, both in solo improvisations and in polyphonic ensembles. The many-sided interrelations of the vocal, vocal-choreographic and instrumental elements in Russian folk music constitute an important study.

(vi) Ethnomusicological and musical developments. Contemporary Russian ethnomusicologists recognize that there is not a single system of 'musical folklore' that unites all local traditions and dialects and that there are no single systems of genre, mode, rhythm, timbre or texture, either. Rather, there are diverse local styles as well as local genre and tuning systems and a variety of sound-ideals. There are many vague and transitory musical forms resulting from complex waves of colonization and migration within the country. Behind these processes lies the historically deep phenomenon of ethnogenesis. Ethnic traditions may be viewed as comparable to a multitude of local dialects. In addition, though, musical conceptualization varies within the same tradition according to other factors, such as generation and occupation. Similarly, the classification of a type of music as 'archaic' has no meaning for those people who perform that music as part of their everyday musical self-realization. As a result of intensive ethnomusicological fieldwork throughout the whole of Russia, the variety of newly discovered local tradition and styles has come to the fore. Moreover, there are newly recognized musical forms and types of music-making, particularly in the field of part-singing (see POLYPHONY, §II, 3. Russian ethnomusicologists still study mainly the folklore of their own people and see their leading task as the creation of a new picture of Russian music of the oral tradition, which is one that relates to imaginary landscapes. These comprise three coexisting landscapes: the musical landscape as a sound portrait of the ethnic culture being studied, that is, musical dialects as a subject of ethnomusical geography (which leads to the constant discovery of microdialects); the 'notational landscape', which has been radically transformed by new methodology (e.g. the 'analytical transcription' of Yevgeny Gippius and his followers); and the whole 'sound landscape' of Russia, which has been changed both by modern technology (radio, television, records, CDs, videos and so on) and by the 'ethnographic concerts' of the 1960s, when performers from remote villages travelled to Moscow, Leningrad and other large cities to perform their traditional folk repertories. As a result, 'secondary folklore' and a huge revival movement called 'folklorism' by Russians (following the Germans) has appeared in modern Russian life.

The best-known ensemble of this genre was led from the 1970s to the 90s by Dmitry Pokrovsky (1944–96). This was initially a folklore group in which ethnomusicologists and other professional musicians became folk singers or instrumentalists by undertaking fieldwork and learning directly from rural traditional singers and musicians. Using traditional principles, they improvised rather than imitated folklore. Pokrovsky's approach inspired numerous followers and, after perestroika, many other groups were formed. They are now able to perform those genres that were forbidden in the recent Soviet past, such as religious folklore, 'spiritual verses' and Christmas dramas (Porter, 1997).

2. NON-RUSSIAN PEOPLES IN EUROPEAN RUSSIA. For the purposes of the present article the non-Russian peoples of the European part of the Russian Federation under discussion include the Finno-Ugric peoples in the Republic of Komi and the Komi-Permyak autonomous region, namely the Komis (formerly known as Zïryan) and Permyaks; the Finno-Ugric and Turkic peoples living along the great central bend of the Volga River (Povolzh′ye) and the nearby Kama and Ural rivers, namely the contiguous Udmurts (formerly known as Votyaks), Mordvins, Maris (formerly known as Cheremis), Chuvashes, Tatars and Bashkirs; and the Kalmïk Mongols, who live near the Volga delta some distance south. The Volga peoples and the Kalmyks have their own republics within the Russian Federation (Udmurtiya, Mordoviya, Mari Ėl, Chuvashiya, Tatarstan, Bashkortostan and Kalmïkiya respectively). The Komis and Permyaks number about 500,000. The estimated total population of the Volga Ugriss is about 2·5 million, the Volga Turkic peoples number about 9·9 million and the Kalmïk Mongols about 142,000. For adjacent and related musical cultures see FINLAND, §II and ESTONIA, §II and for the Russian Sámi (800) of Murmansk province see SÁMI MUSIC.

The languages of the Finnic peoples, the Komis and Permyaks, and the Maris, Udmurts and Mordvins, belong to the Finno-Ugric (Uralic) language family. The Chuvashes, Tatars and Bashkirs have Turkic languages, related to Mongol languages including Kalmïk, and together these form the Turco-Mongol branch of the Altaic language family.

Inhabitants of the Volga-Ural area are descendants of a wide variety of peoples, ranging from the Huns and medieval Bulgars to the Mongols of Genghis (Chinggis) Khan's time, and have lived for centuries with a large eastern Slav and Finno-Ugric population in their midst. The Kalmïks are Oirat or Western Mongols who arrived in their present area in two waves, that is, when a group of Torgut and Dörbet Mongols migrated to the Trans-Volga steppe in 1630 to escape from the powerful Jungar leader Khara Khula, and then in 1758, after the majority of Oirats were destroyed by the Qing-Mongol army and the Jungar State fell.

Musically, the diversity just cited is well reflected in the instruments used by the Volga-Ural peoples. Particularly striking are the Kalmïks, who play lutes associated with the Mongols, the Altai Turkic peoples and the Kazakhs, one zither relating to Siberia and another to eastern Europe, and a whole set of religious instruments integral to Buddhist worship which stem from Tibet. The six peoples of the central Volga-Ural region can be roughly divided into two groups in terms of their musical instruments. The Tatars and Bashkirs seem closer to Central Asia in their use of long open end-blown flutes and lutes similar to the Kazakh dömbra, while the Maris, Chuvashes, Mordvins and Udmurts lean more towards fipple flutes, bagpipes and zithers related to east European instruments. Unique to the area are the musical bow (konkón) of the Maris and the chïpchïrgán of the Udmurts, an open pipe between 1·5 and 2 metres long played by inhalation. Common to the entire region is the adoption of various forms of accordion prevalent in Russia, together with local variants.

(i) Komis and Permyaks. The Komis are an exception among the Finno-Ugric peoples in the sense that they formed an autochthonous, semi-independent feudal state by the 14th century, when they were included in the Moscow Rus of the Slavs. The Komis and Permyaks live in vast territories covered with subarctic coniferous forests and a multitude of rivers, lakes and swamps, and their music forms a distinctive style area with several local subareas according to geographical location. Komi musical traditions are usually classified according to peoples living in different river areas, that is, the Vïchegda-Sïsola area in the south-west and south, the Izhma-Pechora area in the north and east, and the Vïm-Udora area in the north-west and west. The song traditions of the Izhma-Pechora Komis include improvised work and journey songs, and epic narratives with themes that overlap with those of the adjacent Nenets Samoyeds. The Vïm-Udora Komis perform archaic songs of annual agricultural rituals as well as contemporary Russian-style songs. Ritual laments have been important in weddings, funerals and recruiting rituals everywhere, especially among the Vïm-Udorans.

Southern Komi heroic epics (for instance those about the heroes Pedor Kiron and Kir′yan Var′yan) express the history of the Komis, telling how their heroes fought together with the Rus against the Tatar Mongols, while epics of the Izhma-Pechora Komis describe the tribal activities of the northern reindeer herders. Permyak epics include myths of origin, such as the bear-ancestor myth in the Kudym-Osha or Pera epic cycles of the Finno-Permyans. Tales and legends about the ancient Chuds (a Finno-Ugric native population in the tales of northern Russia) are also widely distributed among the Permyaks.

Wedding rituals among the Komis and Permyaks are complex, being dominated musically by ritual laments that occur during different phases of the process. Russian influences are notable in the lyrical and chastushka-type songs.

The dominant musical features in Komi and Permyak traditional music are a tonal system based on simple diatonicism with only a few pitches used in a modest melodic movement of 2nds and 3rds. Contemporary songs tend to have wider ambitus than earlier ones, with Mixolydian and Aeolian modes predominating. Anhemitonicism is very rare and restricted only to the genres thought to be the most archaic. There are both syllabic and melismatic melodic styles; melismatic styles are used mostly in improvised work songs of the Izhma Komis. There are several styles of multi-part singing, from the simple heterophony of Izhma Komi improvised songs to polyphonic songs proper. The Komi and Permyak instrumentarium includes idiophones such as the shepherd's signal instruments pu baraban (wooden board), pu pan′yas (wooden spoons), gïrnich′yas (series of clay pots, beaten with hands) and chordophones, such as the plucked three- and four-string box zithers sigudök-pöv or sigudök-kumli, or the plucked log zither, brungan. Sigudök (Russ. gudok) is a wooden bowed lute or spike fiddle with three strings and variously shaped body. Most variety, however, occurs among the aerophones, which range from simple free reed instruments such as the syumöd kil′, made from a piece of birchbark, to flutes such as kuima chipsan, an open triple flute made from the stems of umbellate plants, clarinets such as bad′pu pölyan, an idioglot clarinet usually with three finger-holes, and trumpets such as syumöd buksan, also made from birchbark.

(ii) Udmurts (Votyaks). Like their Mari neighbours, the Udmurts traditionally placed great stress on a complex set of religious beliefs and rituals – for example, the agricultural spring ritual akashka. Communal prayers (e.g. kuris′kon) and sacrifices were organized on a clan (vorshud) basis. Songs are highly valued by the Udmurts and the melodies of songs used in important rituals, such as the wedding songs (syuan gur, or böris' gur), are identified according to clans and their villages. In tsarist times, recruits were expected to leave songs of their own composition behind as souvenirs when they left their village. This custom also applied to girls who married out of the community. During domestic festivities the hosts were required to compose songs for the guests, while the latter had to return the obligation by improvising additional songs of their own. Riddles and fairy tales are also favourites, with whole evenings being devoted to these entertainments. Udmurt music may be divided into northern and southern styles. Northerners prefer epic recitation with thematic features in common with their Permian neighbours, while southerners lean more towards love-songs in a style close to that of the Tatars and Bashkirs. Songs are mostly performed without instrumental accompaniment.

In ritual songs in particular, only trichords with major 2nds are used (e.g. C–D–E), occasionally expanded to an anhemitonic tetrachord (e.g. C–D–E–G). A wide variety of verse types is used, usually with a combination of 7- to 15-syllable half lines of text. Among the southern Udmurts, ritual songs have two or three parts, which results in a heterophonic melodic contour.

Modern Udmurt music, introduced during the Soviet period, began with productions by local theatrical organizations. The first presentations were based on Udmurt folk music and ceremonial themes, such as Maiorov's Udmurt Wedding of 1918. Of particular importance in the early years was the work of K. Gerd, an actor, playwright and collector of folksongs, whose anthologies were published in the 1920s.

(iii) Maris (Cheremis). The western Mari areas are covered with huge forests, while the central and eastern regions are mostly fields and pastures; the rural population makes its living partly by forestry and partly by agriculture. Fishing and bee-keeping are also important occupations. According to geographical position, dialects and musical and other traditions, four groups of Mari people can be distinguished. The Meadow Maris occupy three-quarters of the republic's territory: theirs is the official and literary language. The remaining south-west region is the home of the Hill Maris. The third group, the north-western Maris, live in the Nizhegorodskaya and Kirov provinces, adjacent to Mari Ėl and the fourth, the eastern groups of Mari, live in the republics of Tartarstan, Udmurtia and Bashkortostan, and in Perm' and Sverdlovsk provinces. According to their musical traditions, these eastern groups may be further subdivided into the western or Yelabuga Maris (Tatarstan and Udmurtia), southern or Ufa Maris (Bashkortostan), northern or Perm' Maris and the eastern or Sverdlovsk Maris.

As a result of their living at the meeting-point of Finno-Ugric, Slavonic and Turkic cultures, the music of the Maris shows extensive foreign influence and several different musical styles. Interaction of the Finno-Ugric and Turkic peoples was facilitated by the monophonic nature of both musical cultures, which may be a reason why the Maris and the neighbouring Turkic-speaking peoples have not borrowed many musical elements from Russian folk music, which is predominantly polyphonic.

The Mari musical tradition is still a living, changing and integral part of everyday life. Weddings, funerals, soldiers' farewells, the arrival of guests, young people's partings from the paternal home, midsummer and mid-winter greetings and brewing are all occasions for singing. Short, lyrical songs predominate and Mari folk poetry has none of the epic traditions so characteristic of other Finno-Ugric peoples.

The eastern Maris have retained innumerable elements of ancient Mari culture, such as pre-Christian beliefs, rituals performed in gatherings in the forests, animal offerings and funeral rituals. Their melodies are also archaic. The major-sounding pentatonic tunes with four short lines, simple construction and ample repetitions are very different from those of the surrounding Bashkir, Tatar or Russian musical traditions. At most, there is some resemblance to certain melodic types of the Meadow Maris.

In the music of the Meadow Maris two basic, sharply divergent forms can be observed. The first consists of four-line melodies typical of the eastern and northern regions of the republic. Their range encompasses mostly the pentatonic scale G–A–C–D–E, but in some areas one with the structure C–D–E–G–A is used. Among these songs a typical construction is that in which the third line is a lower, possibly varied, repetition of the first line, a 2nd to a 4th below, and the fourth line is a repetition of the second (ex.12). There are, however, numerous tunes of different form, with a descending melodic line and motifs of varied shape. Tetratonic melodies are occasionally found and are presumably of earlier origin.

The music of the southern Meadow Maris is characterized by arched melodies with a 5th-shift: in four-line melodies, the third and fourth lines are exact repetitions of the first two, a 5th lower. When the two halves of the melody appear to be in different keys, the range remains anhemitonic pentatonic of the type G–A–C–D–E: this is a 5th-shift with a real answer. One of the main characteristics of Meadow Mari 5th-shift melodies is 6/8 metre, as opposed to other Mari tunes where 2/4 and 4/4 metres predominate. It is probable that Mari 5th-shift melodies developed under the influence of the neighbouring Turkic musical cultures. In the music of the eastern Mari the 5th-shift is unknown.

From among the different Mari melodies, the 5th-shift tunes of the Hill Maris are the most widely known. Here the 5th-shift is not real but tonal, so that the pentatonic scale remains unchanged and the 5th-shift is more or less modified (ex.13). Upon analysing the characteristics of Mari and Chuvash 5th-shift melodies Bartók and Kodály

Mari folk instruments include: the küsle, a trapeziform zither with between 20 and 22 strings plucked with the hands; the shüvïr (fig.8), a bagpipe with a single or double chanter, which is accompanied at weddings by a tümïr (drum); the shialtïsh (wooden flute with two to five finger-holes); the shüshpïk, clay ocarinas shaped like animals; the kovïzh, a carved wooden two-string fiddle; and three types of horn, the puch (of cow horn), shïzhe-puch (wooden) and the bark sürem-puch, which is between 150 and 200 cm long. These were traditionally used to announce that a house had a marriageable girl, or were played during the many ceremonies of animal sacrifice.

Like the music cultures of other Volga-Ural peoples, Mari traditional music underwent considerable development during the 20th century. The work of local composers resulted in a considerable output of compositions on Mari themes, and Russian composers have also written compositions based on Mari source material. Musical schools and institutes have been established and folk ensembles abound.

(iv) Mordvins. A 19th-century Russian traveller reported hearing Mordvins singing when he was five miles away from a village. This account is evidence of the Mordvins' love of song, both on special occasions or simply to pass the time during long winter nights. Mordvin traditional music encompasses a considerable range of scalar structures, voices and metro-rhythmic patterns, and the peculiarities of the local traditions correspond both with the distribution of the two Mordvin languages, namely Moksha and Ėrzya, and with the fused traditions of their multi-ethnic environment. Among monophonic songs slow or moderately paced pentatonic tunes are found with extensive narrative texts, sometimes telling an entire tale. These may be in a uniform metre or heterometric. Two- and three-part songs often begin with a soloist's introduction and reveal a wide variety of treatment. The lower voice may sound in unison with the upper voices with or without a drone, or they may move as relatively free contrapuntal lines. The use of parallel 3rds and a final cadence on an octave or unison, also reminiscent of Russian folksongs, is quite common. The Ėrzyans are praised particularly for their abilities to sing Russian polyphonic songs.

Such echoes of the neighbouring Russians are not surprising. A document of 1696 describes interested Mordvin spectators watching an outdoor Russian minstrel-theatrical production, and Russian influence has been steady ever since then. The widespread presence of the European violin and accordion also testify to the Russian impact. Whether or not the Mordvin nyudi, a paired single-reed pipe, is related directly to the Russian zhaleyka is difficult to determine, but the nyudi marks the eastern limit of such aerophones, which have no Central Asian representative between the Mordvins and the Uzbek qoshnai far to the south-east.

Of particular interest socially is the body of traditional Mordvin wedding songs. As weddings were seen as a struggle between two opposing clans, songs for the occasion were divided musically between the bride's and the groom's camps, with each side maintaining its own melodic motif. Various greetings and benedictory songs also occur in the wedding ceremony. The bride was expected to change from a 'maiden's voice' (teiter'ks chin val'gei) to a deeper, coarser 'woman's voice' (ure val'gei) after the wedding. The bride's lament was a highly developed genre, being expressed most fully by a long night of solo singing out of doors. In that time the bride directed individual songs to the four points of the compass, the upper and household gods, the family well, her ancestors, the sunrise and her village, in this order.

The early development of modern Mordvin music is closely linked with the activities of M.Ye. Yevsev'yev and L. Kiryukov. An orchestra of Mordvin folk instruments existed by 1918.

(v) Chuvashes. The Chuvashes are descendants of the earliest inhabitants of the central Volga region, originating in the mingling of Finno-Ugric, Bulgar-Turkish and Tatar tribes. Most Chuvashes are now settled within the confines of Chuvashiya, while a minority lives in the central and western territories of Tatarstan. Agriculture is the chief occupation of the population. The firmly rooted oral tradition plays a significant role in Chuvash culture. Folk music is an integral part of festivities such as those for Shrove Tuesday, weddings, hay-making or burial.

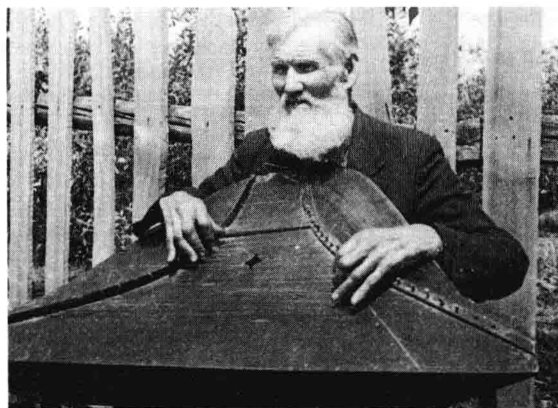
Three main Chuvash groups may be distinguished: the Viryal Chuvashes, in the northern areas of the republic; the Anatri (and Anat Yenchi) Chuvashes, in the central and southern regions; and the Chuvashes who settled in such places as Buinsk, Tyetushi, Aksubayevo and Tseremshan in Tatarstan. The last are particularly notable, for as a result of their isolation they have retained a more archaic culture. Their rich tradition resembles that of the Anatri Chuvashes.

The fact that peoples in the central Volga region had lived together for centuries played a decisive role in the development of the different melodic patterns of Chuvash folk music. The Chuvashes were in close contact with the Tatars of Kazan′ on the one hand and the Maris on the other. Signs of this contact may be discerned in their music, fused with original Chuvash stylistic features. The texts of Chuvash melodies are exclusively lyrical. Epic tradition is as rare among them as among the Maris. The generic borderlines of the songs coincide with the thematic content of the songs, as in tuy (wedding), saltak (recruiting), váyá (spring feast), kéréke, yupa (ritual) or tashá yurrisem (dance songs).

Viryal Chuvash folksongs are characterized by a descending melodic line, an anhemitonic pentatonic scale and four-section structure. At the northern border, where they live close to the Mountain Maris, they sing tunes similar to Mari ones, using the 5th-shift construction but with Chuvash texts. The melodic line remains descending even in the absence of the 5th-shift construction. In addition to even metres, bars with asymmetrical metres (5/4, 7/8 etc.) occur remarkably often. Fast songs are syllabic; slow songs are typically recited with moderate ornamentation of the main notes. The pentatonic scale and the 5th-shift construction were presumably introduced into Mari and Hungarian music through Chuvash mediation, and the congruences in the music of the two Finno-Ugric peoples (Maris and Hungarians) originate from a third Turkic-speaking source, the Chuvashes.

Among the southern Anatri Chuvashes, songs consist predominantly of three-line stanzas. The three lines do not contain three separate musical patterns: the second line is usually repeated with a new text (ABB). A five-line form is obtained when the second or third lines are repeated with a new text. The range of these melodies is generally narrower than that of the quatrain (i.e. the descending melodies with 5th-shift construction) and it moves around a 6th, only seldom exceeding an octave. The length of the melodic lines is, however, not restricted. On average there are four bars to each line and the number of syllables varies between 9 and 14. The Chuvash anhemitonic pentatonic scales (D–E–G–A–H, E–G–A–H–D, G–A–H–D–E and A–H–D–E–G) often alternate with the semitonal scale (G–B–C–D–E). An example of the latter is the well-known two-line melody of a wedding lament, in which the bride takes leave of her parents (ex.14).

Ex.14 Chuvash wedding lament, transcr. L. Vikár



The Chuvashes living in Tatar territories have kept characteristic musical features that once might have existed among Anatri Chuvash people. It may be presumed that melodies consisting of three or four notes, and repeating and varying one single line, represent the oldest layer of Chuvash folk music and the original practice of improvisation. The extremely rich ornamentation may have been introduced under Tatar influence.

Chuvash instrumental music can mostly be traced to vocal origins: melodies performed on instruments are identical with those generally sung. The only exceptions are the fast dance-songs played on the violin, accordion or the küsle (trapeziform zither with 17 strings or more; fig.9). Other instruments used by the Chuvashes include tam-shakhlïcha (clay whistles), shakhlïcha (duct flute with two, four or seven finger-holes), shabr (a bladder-pipe with a double chanter), sarnay (a bagpipe with one melody pipe and two drones), tutut (birch-bark horn 45 to 50 cm long) and the parappan (double-headed drum).

A large-scale movement developed among the Chuvash intelligentsia in the late 1920s in which composers participated. S. Maksimov, M. Ilin and V. Vorobyov started to collect folksongs systematically, but few of the several thousand folksongs recorded by Maksimov and others have been published. Between 1964 and 1970 László Vikár and Gábor Bereczki visited all the dialect regions and recorded 800 tunes.

Modern Chuvash music began early: the first national chorus performed in Moscow in 1923. A music college was opened in 1929, and the symphony orchestra was founded in 1932. F.P. Pavlov was an important musical pioneer, active as a composer, organizer, collector of folksongs and theorist.

(vi) Tatars. The Volga Tatars are to be distinguished from their namesakes of the Crimea, of Astrakhan and of western Siberia. They are usually subdivided into two large groups, the Kazan′ Tatars and Mishar Tatars. Within these subdivisions one must also differentiate between Muslim and Christian Tatars (the main groups of the latter are the Tatar-Kryashens of the Kama river and the Nagaybaks of the southern Urals), located as they are at the juncture of Islam and Christianity. Though the Christian Tatars have had closer cultural ties with nearby co-religionists (Mordvins, Chuvashes, Maris and Russians), they have nevertheless preserved a significant portion of the common Tatar heritage.

9. Chuvash küsle (zither) player

Among the Tatars, as among the Bashkirs, there is an important division of song types which is more closely related to practice in the Altai region and Mongolia than to traditions to the west. The two basic genres are the 'long-song' (özen küi) and the 'short-song'. The long-song is marked by highly ornamented, melismatic melody, free rhythm, free use of text (including fragmentation of words), extreme lengthening of final syllables and slow tempo, in contrast to the quick, syllabic, sparsely ornamented style of the short-song. Its style is analogous to that of the Russian protyazhnaya pesnya or the Turkish uzun hava. The fully developed özen küi is used less among the Mishar and Christian Tatars. Ex.15 shows the opening of an özen küi. As among the Bashkirs, Tatars also sing songs in styles somewhere between those of the long- and short-song, for example the takmak, bait and khushavaz.

Though pentatonic scales play an important role in Tatar music, other scalar structures abound. Melodic contour is similarly varied. Tunes with a two-part structure in which the tune is transposed up or down a fixed distance, like those noted for the Maris and Chuvashes, occur frequently in Tatar music, but there are also many songs with a gradual descent to the tonic or in arch form. A tendency in Turkic folk poetry to insert great numbers of non-text syllables in a text is often observed in Tatar folksong texts. Here, for example, are two lines of a song text in which the non-text syllables are given in parentheses:

zhe (ie) ge (e)t cha(ia) klar(i) da (di le) bar (la)da(la) j (ie) de Ki (e)ng u(iu)ram(i) nar da be(ie) ege (le) ai tar i (ie) de
(When we were young broad streets seemed narrow.)

Like the Bashkirs, the Tatars play the kuray (an end-blown flute) and the dumbra (a lute, related to the Kazakh dömbra), although the latter is now rare.

Because Kazan′ has long been a key city for both Tatars and Russians, the Tatars have been in close contact with Russian culture since Ivan the Terrible's conquest of the city in 1552. Russian and European music were introduced early, well before Soviet times. Clearly one of the earliest borrowings from Europe was the accordion which, after being modified to suit local taste, became the chief accompanying instrument from the late 19th century. After the Revolution professional music in the European sense developed among the Tatars, leading to the establishment of the Kazan′ State Conservatory in 1945. Sultan Gabyashi (1891–1942) is usually cited as the first Tatar musicologist and composer.

Ex.15 Opening of a Tatar özen küi, Urman

(vii) Bashkirs. Like the Tatars, the Bashkirs distinguish between 'long-songs' (uzun küi), marked by free rhythm, highly melismatic melody, fragmented text and extremely extended final syllables, and 'short-songs' (kiska küi), syllabic songs in fairly quick tempo with more or less even note values. A story is basic to the long-song, with singers taking on the mood of the characters being depicted. Within the category of short-songs, a newer variety called takmak was developed in the 19th century, apparently connected with the rise of the accordion as an accompanying instrument and related to the Russian chastushka.

Other basic types of song include the kubair, or epic recitation, which was evidently dying out in the 19th century, the senliau (bride's lament) and teliak (greeting of the bride by the groom's kin), which are examples of wedding songs, and the newer bait, a topical song, for example a 19th-century tune on the subject of the introduction of tea-drinking among the Bashkirs. One highly distinctive genre not practised by other Volga-Ural peoples is the uzlyau, a method of guttural singing whereby the performer first produces a deep chest tone and then simultaneously projects of high-pitched melody line based on the upper partials of the fundamental, creating two-part music by a single singer. This technique, quite rare even in the 19th century, is paralleled among the Altai Turks, Tuvans and Mongols (see also INNER ASIA, §1, OVERTONE-SINGING and MONGOL MUSIC, §4). Ex.16 is an example of uzlyau transcribed in the 1930s.

Ex.16 Opening of a Bashkir uzlyau

As with the neighbouring Kazakhs and Kirghiz, Bashkir instrumental music traditionally contained strong elements of story. Thus, players of the kurai (long end-blown flute, usually with four finger-holes) are able with their music to project a plot to listeners. Kurai players seem to be accorded the importance associated with lutenists among the Kazakhs and Kirghiz. They participate in contests of skill and receive high praise as wandering minstrels. The kurai player can perform in a manner analogous to that of the uzlyau song by maintaining a strong, steady, fundamental hum under a lively flute tune. Such a style can be found among widely separated players of open end-blown flutes, such as the Baluchi (in Iran and Afghanistan), the Altai Urianghais, Tuvans and Kazakhs (West Mongolia), and certain east Europeans, for instance Romanians, Slovaks and Serbs.

The era of modern Bashkir music began in 1919 with the establishment of the professional theatre and opening of the first music school. The first Bashkir opera was M. Val′eyev's Khakmar, produced in 1940.

(viii) Kalmïks. The Kalmïks, though separated from their homeland and compatriots for over 350 years, have preserved a significant portion of their Mongol musical heritage, despite considerable acculturation to Tatar, Cossack and Russian cultural patterns. Their songs frequently fall into the long-short (ut dun–akhr dun) dichotomy described for the Tatars and Bashkirs. Two-register songs featuring melodic transposition are found, as well as songs with large melodic leaps. Long-songs, ut dun, are predominantly melismatic. The (usually) hexasyllabic text line is begun in a declamatory style but then is stretched into a melismatic tail. The melodic line is composed of two layers of anhemitonic tonal space, between which the melody moves as a 'question-answer' pattern.

Song texts and performing practice reflect a wide range of subject matter, from work songs associated with fishing and herding to love-songs and the epic tales of the hero Janggar. The elongation of syllables is also used as a vocal technique during epic performances, and OVERTONE-SINGING is also used in some passages. Long-songs (ut dun or shastr dun) are used during official events, such as weddings (ex.10), and long-song vocal techniques are sometimes employed in other genres, such as praise-songs or magtal dun and in küük uulyuldg dun, that is, lament-like songs about the hardships of the bride in the house of the groom's family.

Instrumental music is usually played to accompany dancing, an entertainment widespread among Kalmïks. A solo dancer takes his cues from the dömbra (lute) player, performing a variety of gestures while standing in place.

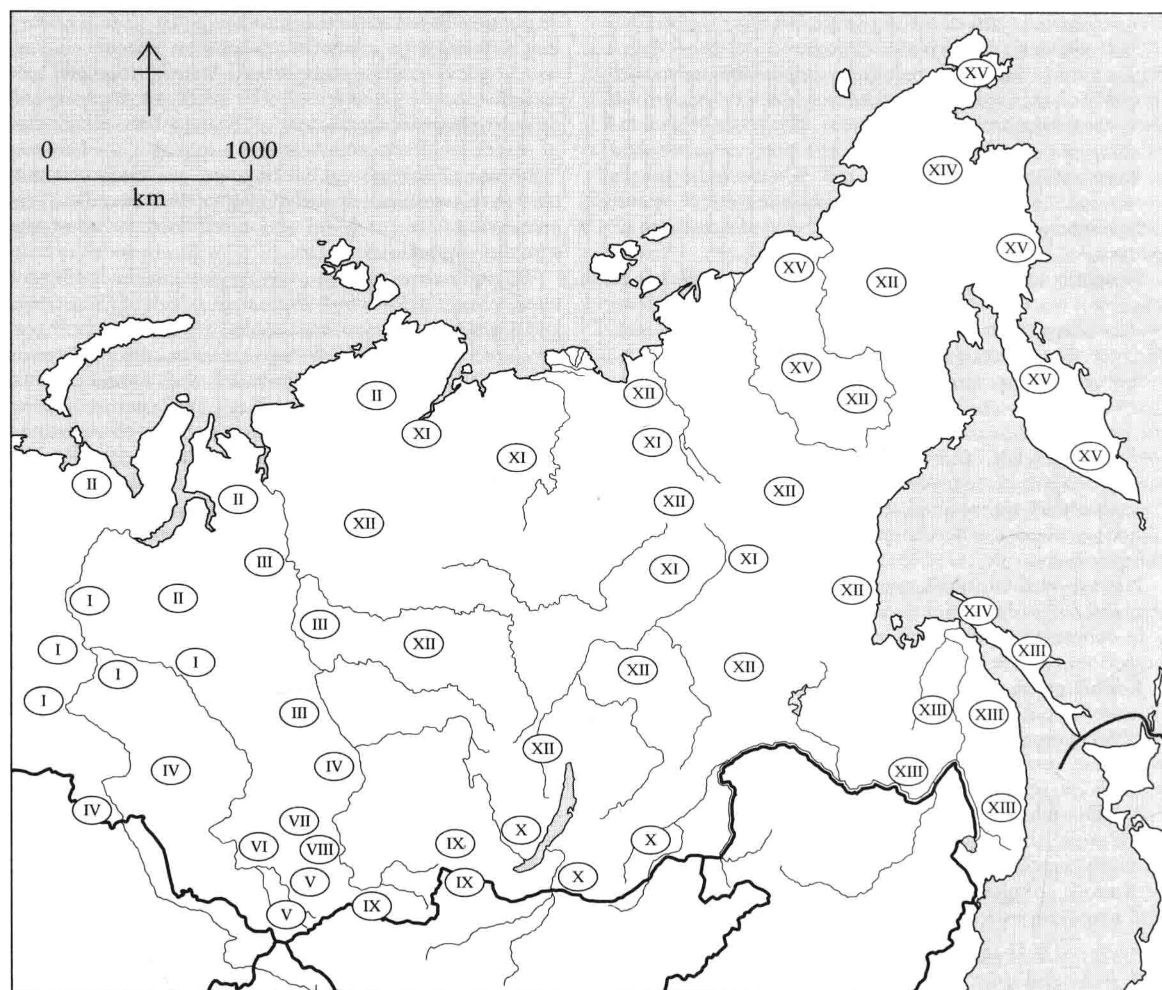
Kalmïk association with Russian and European music is quite old. According to one account, a Kalmïk khan used to maintain a household orchestra, which included European instruments, capable of playing Mozart and Rossini overtures. In the late 19th century the Kalmïk cellist Dordzhi Mandzhiyev performed in St Petersburg. Since then, these musical ties with Europe have been strengthened and broadened, resulting in the appearance of Kalmïk composers of European-style classical music and a repertory which includes operas and symphonies.

3. SIBERIAN PEOPLES. Siberia is a vast area of subarctic and arctic zones in Russian northern Asia. It is usually defined as bordering the Ural mountains in the west, the Central Asian steppes and Inner Asian mountains in the south and reaching the Pacific and Arctic Oceans in the east and north. Siberian indigenous peoples traditionally hunt, fish or breed cattle. Including the Siberian Tatars and the northern indigenous minorities of China and Mongolia their population is around two million, of which speakers of native languages comprise roughly 1·2 million. Great changes in their traditional socio-economic and cultural systems have occurred, especially during the 20th century.

Fig.10 illustrates the ethnic groups and their localities. Several ethnonyms encompass local sub-groups, between which languages or dialects may be incomprehensible. Mostly this classification conforms to the boundaries of the major Siberian language groups: the Uralic Sámi (see SÁMI MUSIC), Samoyed and Ob-Ugrian languages; and the Turkic (Tatar, Altai and Khakass), Mongol (Buryat) and Tungus languages. Others are either remnants of small language groups or isolated languages, for example those of the Ket, Yukagir, Itelmen, Nivkh, Chukchi-Koryak and Yupik-Aleut languages.

(i) Musical characteristics and influences. The music of indigenous Siberians is predominantly vocal. Sound imitations, signals and short melodies in various song, shamanistic and dance genres are important in the vocal domain. Characteristic features include: a system of intonation based on timbres, where pitch is of secondary importance (e.g. inhalation-exhalation throat singing, whirling and rotating aerophones); lyrical, ritual and epic melodies based on single-timbre voice production; and the use of large intervallic leaps. Characteristic of melodies of Arctic nomads and hunters, such as the Nenetses, Nganasans, Yukagirs and Chukchis, are pitch sets that tend to change and expand during performance. Musical instruments are marginal and often used as non-tonal sound or signal instruments.

Where instruments are more important, they influence vocal ranges and define rhythm (e.g. celebration songs and shaman's songs accompanied by drum, wood log, pendant rattles). When flutes, trumpets, zithers, lutes or harps are used they affect tonal and modal norms, especially during shamanistic rituals, bear ceremonies and the epic performances. Monodic singing with an instrumental accompaniment is a tradition of the Ob-Ugrians, Altai and Sayan Turks, Khakasses and Buryats.



The music cultures of southern Siberia that border and have a long history of contact with China, Central Asia and Russia, have adopted traditions of musical conceptualization from these adjoining cultures, along with their own fixed systems of intonation. Cultural influences, such as the practices of Buddhism, Islam or Christianity, have been adopted by some of the Siberian groups as well as musical instruments and melodies. The latter can be seen in the stanza form of songs, in the concept of initial and final tones in pentatonic systems (the Tuvans, Buryats and the peoples of Amur) and the metricization and in change towards the Western major–minor tonality in the traditional melodies of the Altai Turks, Evenkis, Sakhas and Itelmens.

(ii) Vocal music.

(a) Sound imitations and signals. Each Siberian group uses sounds that imitate, embody and interact with sounds of the natural world. A collection of onomatopoeic 'titular' signals represent the voices of animals and birds important to the group's culture of intonation (e.g. the cuckoo, owl and ptarmigan; ex.17*a*). In addition there are luring, decoy and imitative sound signals addressed to various animals during hunting and cattle breeding, and exclamations used for controlling animals during the hunt and herding (ex.17*b*, c). Buryats, Tuvans and Altai Turks perform melodies while feeding the new-born animals and during milking (ex.17*d*).

Sounds used as lullabies occur among the Nganasans (n'uo l'anterï), Evenkis (kumakan hegan), Koryaks (kar-wel'u) and Chukchis (kïnil'etkin grep; ex.17*e*). Songs of childhood are composed for an individual child. These are found among the Odul Yukagirs (shiishii), Chukchis (chakchechang), Koryaks (cakhcichang), Kereks (t'akyit'an) and Nenetses (ngatsyekï syo, nyukubts; ex.17*f*).

(b) Song. Vocal forms display great variation. Some local traditions have improvised melodies, the texts of which consist predominantly of vocables. In others there may be some semantic text in the songs, but they remain subordinate to the song's timbral and melodic features. These can be found in the individual songs of the Northern Sámi of Scandinavia, the Ob-Ugrians (sow, sowe, sahe), Samoyed-speaking peoples (syo, shyo, say), southern Altai Turks and Teleuts (küü), northern Altai Turks (tabïsh), Khakasses and Shors (kög), Sayan Turks and Buryats (ayalga), northern Tunguses (haan, hagaawun, og, ogen),

10. Indigenous peoples of Siberia

Udes (dzaga), Nivkhs (yu, au) and Chukchi-Koryak and Yupik-Aleut peoples (angadel'il, khodilakht, angalek, tipeyngen, kïmni). These songs are one of the fundamentals of the Arctic music cultures, comparable to the singer's personal name as a means of self-identification (ex.18*a*).

Improvisatory songs that have a more fixed melody may have texts that are metrically unfixed and alterable. However, as with the improvised melodies discussed above, they can conform to their own laws of metricization, although these are not verbalized, as for example among the Nenetses and the Khantys. Sometimes these songs have meaning as family songs, comparable to the individual songs above. These are found among the Ob-Ugrians (erïkh, erey, ar, are, arekh), northern Samoyedic peoples (khïnabts, kïnawsh, bare, belï), Selkup Samoyeds and Yenisei Kets (ïngïma, il'ir), northern Tunguses (iken, ike), Amur Tunguses (iekhe, dzarin, ike, yaya, ikheian, hege), Nivkhs (lu, lund) and the Chukchi-Koryak and Yupik-Aleut peoples (yakhtel, chakales repnun, qul'iqul', grep, uglyutkun, uglyut, kogyak; see ex.18*b*.)

The versified songs have an invariable metric structure for both the melody and text, and also fixed and verbalized principles for regulating the relationship between them. Improvisation in these songs is governed by fairly strict rules and concerns only the themes. These songs predominate among the southern Altai Turks (qozhong), Siberian Tatars (ïr, iyr), northern Turks (ïraya), Tofas (ïr) and Sakhas (ïrïa). A distinction is made between rhythmic 'short-song' songs with verses and metrically free and melismatic 'long-songs' among Buryats (uta duun/bogoni duun, 'long-song/short-song'), Tuvans (ïr/qozhamïq), Teleuts (sarïn/tandïr), Khakasses, northern Altai Turks and Shors (sarïn/takhpakh; see ex.18*c*).

Allegorical songs with verses are found among the Nganasans (keyngeyrsya; ex.18*d*), Nivkhs (walhlu, alhtund) and Mansis (ulilap). They form a distinct genre with particular melodies, and a system of allegorical poetic expression with specific principles governing the relationship between text and melody.

In other songs the musical structure may be cumulative and dynamically expanding, and the textual themes may have distinct melodic expressions. These occur, for instance, among the Sakhas (ex.18*e*), Yuits (il'agan), Ulchas (haund'ari) and Evenkis (dawlaawun, kochindz'a). The epic songs of the northern Samoyeds (yarabts, shotpyalsh, d'öre, d'urïmi) lie between these songs and epic poetry.

OVERTONE-SINGING (see TUVAN MUSIC, and §II, 3(vii) and (vii), above) is an extraordinary vocal technique in which overtones are produced by a single singer using the chest or oral cavities to create resonances that form a two- or three-voiced texture (ex.18*f*). It occurs with many variations among the Tuvans (khömey, sïgït, ezengileer, kargïraa and borbangnadïr), Altai Turks (karkïraa), Sakhas (khabarga), and among Mongols just south of Siberia. Usually, when occurring during song, the text and overtone passages form separate sections. Overtone-singing has connections with ritual practices and epic poetry.

(c) Epics. The term 'epic' is used here to refer to the performance of myths, legends or tales in sung, recited or prose form, sometimes with instrumental passages.

Epic songs may be grouped according to three melodic types. One type of epic uses melodies of lyric songs,

Here the melodic types are usually identified and associated with the name of the main character of the tale. A third type of epic performance is recited with a special vocal tone, related to overtone-singing, that sets it apart from the usual singing or speaking voice. This type is called tool by the Tuvans, performed with a vocal style known as alganir (ex.19*c*); kai shördzhök by the Chelkans; kay chörchök by the Teleuts; and tuul' khäälakh by the Altai Urianghais of West Mongolia. Epics performed using this special vocal tone are accompanied by a two-string plucked lute (topshuur) among the southern Altai Turks, the Teleuts and among the west Mongolian Altai Urianghais.

In epic narratives with sung passages the text, which emphasizes the metre (sometimes using a free speech form of narration), is interrupted by the singing in the personae

During a shamanistic séance, the shaman's assistant (known as teltanggoda, tetagude or tuoptusi among northern Samoyeds, quqïltïmpïl qup among Selkups and beledzert, belnedz or belemnge kuturuksut among northern Turks) may also sing imitatory or responsorial songs. While the shaman's words are important in that they are believed to be the words of the spirits, they are dangerous to human ears and thus an assistant is needed to repeat them. In some places, however, audience members may participate in the performance (ex.20*e*). Among the Buryats (where it is known as böölööshen) and Itelmens, heterophonic singing between the shaman and those participating in the séance occurs (ex.20*f*). A drum introduction to the shaman's ritual, in which those participating take part in turn, is found among the Amur Tunguses (gongoyni, gong-gong and takun-tau), Chukchi-Koryak and Yupik-Aleut peoples (ex.20*g*).

The music of the bear ceremony in the Amur-Sakhalin region is performed only by women. Tunes played on a musical log (ex.21*a*) continuously accompany the performance of myths and rituals, as well as private and public festival and domestic feasting phases of the ceremony (tug's pïznd, tungu, tunkure and tungkere). Ritual melodies are played when the bear is released from his cage, as he is led around the settlement, during the killing and cutting-up of the carcass and the making of sacrificial offerings. Music accompanies recitations of myths, including those describing the marriage of a woman and a bear, the fate of their children and the significance of the raven and the owl (ex.21*b*). Festival melodies accompany sporting contests and domestic feasts. Women's dances, using branches, bundles of twigs and rattles, are also performed during the feast (ex.21*c*).

The music of the Ob-Ugrian bear ceremony is performed principally by men. There are more than 300 obligatory songs, between which interludes are played on the lyre (zither variants of this instrument also exist), harp and lute (ex.21*d*). The genre system is made up of seven cycles of songs. Invocation songs are performed at the start of each day in order to 'arouse' the bear's understanding of the ceremony. Among the Mansis such songs are called kholi erïkh and among the Khantys atïn ar and a'lkhem arekh (ex.21*e*). Songs for the supreme gods that have a heterophonic texture, although performed monophonically, may be recited in melodic or declamatory tones, and tell of the creation of the world and the gods. Among the Mansis they are known as kastil erïkh and among Khantys as kayoyang ar and lhangïltep (ex.21*f*). Songs for the earthly gods are more melodic with a complex allegoric and poetic style, known by the Mansis as yalpïng moyt erïkh and the Khantys as po yaktu ar, w'on ar, mish ar and wont lhunq lhangïlhtep (ex.21*g*). Re-enactment songs with non-religious subject matter, for which the singer wears a mask and special costume, are performed by both the Mansis (tulïglap) and Khantys (lhungulhtuptii and lhangïlhtep; ex.21*h*). Dance-songs or dances of the spirits alternate with these re-enactment songs. These are accompanied by instruments playing songs and tunes, called pupïgh yikw by the Mansis and lungh yaktï and lunq yeqta by the Khantys (ex.21*i*). During the last day of the ceremony, specific songs known as w'on ar (Mansis) and iymeng lhangïlhtep (Khantys) are performed (ex.21*j*). The final performances of the bear ceremony involve sleep-inducing song, which comprise a eulogy and ritual farewell to both the bear and the ceremony. This is called uy ulilap among the Mansis and ul'tï ar and olte lhangïlhtep among the Khantys (ex.21*k*).

(iv) Dance. Dance music is predominantly vocal and involves either sounds produced with a special 'throat singing' technique or round dance-songs and melodies. 'Throat singing' is unique to the peoples of eastern Siberia. It is a mixture of rasping, grunting sounds, produced both by inhalation and exhalation, and tonal sounds in singing voice. It can be performed alone or in a group; group performances may consist of a 'canon-like' sound mixture.

Various throat-singing styles accompany individual dances, round-dances and games. Melodized shouts are heard at the end of a song couplet as a refrain. They are heard in both women's and men's song-dances among Itelmens who know them as khekhmïkels and khemkh-ekudzen (ex.22*a*). Signal melodies accompany men's and women's round-dances among Odul Yukagirs (longdol and tunmun hontol; ex.22*b*), Kolyma Chukchis and Wadul Yukagirs (pilcheyngen), Evens (nörgen, nürgenek and nergene) and reindeer herding Sakhas (chömchöö-köidüür). Sounds imitating the voice of the bear in the ritual round-dance are known by Nganasans (b'etïrs'a and ngarka kuntï; ex.22*c*) and Enetses (khukhoy). Sound games accompany physical exercise and role games among the Nanays (adzikachin, aqolachin and erieken), Udes and Orochs (hakaku; ex.22*d*), Buryats (khurïn nadan), Evenkis (engtevkekel) and Ulchas (khahï). Sound expressions symbolizing, for example, sexuality or the voices of animals, and for the processing of fur hides, are performed only by women among the Chukchis (pilcheyngen), the Koryaks (k'arg'ayngetïk, kïkaretken, kukalya'ayngan and q'ameq'isitiqing), the Kereks (pilgayngan) and the Yuits (saiag'ak'ut and pisaynga) (ex.22*e*).

Songs accompanying round-dances or round dance-songs are part of seasonal 'tribal' offerings and family celebrations. Heterophonic swaying songs are performed by the participants of a round-dance with joined hands. They are known among the Buryats as naygar and ner'elge and among the southern Altai Turks as küreley (ex.22*f*). Antiphonal songs performed by two groups accompany round- and line-dances among the Kuznetsk and northern Altai Turks who call them tabïr (ex.22*g*). Responsorial songs with solo introduction and choral repetition are known among the Sakhas (ohuokhay) and Evenkis (osokay; ex.22*h*). Responsorial songs with a variable solo part followed by an invariable choral refrain are known among western Buryats (yokhor and osoo), Evenkis (yekherie, gesuger and deweyde), Evens (dzakhuria), Dolgans and reindeer-herding Sakhas (kheyro; ex.22*i*). Responsorial melodic shouts, consisting of two- or three-syllable solo shouts with group answers are known among the Evens, Evenkis, Negidals and Oroks (hedze, hodzo and edza) (ex.22*j*).

(a) Idiophones. Rattles are the most representative idiophone. Pastoral rattles are worn on the horns and around the necks of herd animals. Rattles are also found on a child's cradle, a woman's apron and as part of a burial edifice. The equipment of a shaman includes pendants and percussive decorations on both the costume and the drum.

Jew's harps are found among all ethnic groups (except the Samoyeds, Wadul Yukagirs and Yuits). Siberian jew's harps are of five types: those made of simple reeds, trident reeds, branch angles or consisting of idioglottic lamellae and heteroglottic frames (fig.11).

Of the idiophones found in east Siberia, the most important is the suspended log used during the bear ceremony among the Nivkhs (zas t'as, zas tihr, chachand and t'at'at'khas) and the Amur Tunguses (odzapu, udzadzinki, udzadzupu and tumkewun). A structural variant is found among the Sakhas in the form of a slit-drum (dzhälärkäi küpsüür) (fig.12).

The shoulder blade of a reindeer is used as a friction idiophone after inserting into it a rotatable stick. It is used as both a sound imitator and instrument among the Wadul Yukagirs (pidzensaburka amon) and the Indigirka Evens and Kolyma (idiki amunen).

11. (a) Plucked reed; (b) plucked chip-trident; (c) plucked branch-angle; (d) idioglottic lamellar jew's harp; (e) heteroglottic jew's harp

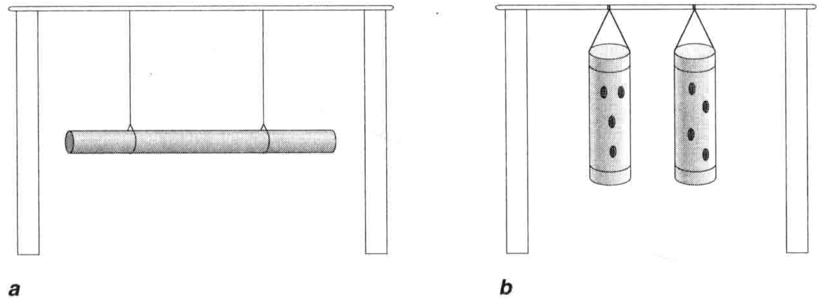
(b) Aerophones. The most widely distributed aerophones have string buzzers spun between the hands or bull-roarers rotating on a longer string. These instruments vary in function from a child's toy to a sacral instrument. The Itelmens and the Karagin Koryaks organize a seasonal pan-'tribal' festival around such an instrument (fig.13). Other aerophones include the whistling arrow, the whistling and slapping whip, sound instruments played by the wind (among the Sakhas) and birch-bark whistles with a single or double leaf.



Among the aerophones with an air channel, special mention should be made of the single-reed quill whistles, fifes made from small reeds and open flutes with an internal slit and finger-holes. Trumpets are also found. The Siberian Tatars, southern and northern Altai Turks, Khakasses, Sayan, Kuznetsk and northern Turks, Buryats and northern and Amur Tunguses use a conical birch-bark trumpet and a thin, cylindrical trumpet (abïrga or bïrgï among the Altai Turks) made out of hollowed-out wood (fig.14) for enticing the reindeer. A unique variant is a long trumpet made from the stem of a hollow grass (Emilia flammaea) known as kiungki and kinguliachikchi among the Udes and k'al'ni and kïla pews among the Nivkhs. On this instrument the sound is produced not by blowing but by sucking.

Trumpet-shaped mirlitons are used by the Itelmens who call them kowon and kalkham, the Koryaks who call them g'eynetkuchg'ïn and Nivkhs who call them kal'ni and ikwp'ewrsh. The leaf mirliton is used by the Khantys, Odul Yukagirs and Tuvans.

(c) Membranophones. The most characteristic membranophone is the frame-drum used by shamans. This may be classified into eight regional types: the Tatar type (tüngür); Altain type (chazim tüngür, kanïm tüür, mars tüür, düngür and khese); Sayan-Yeniseian type (dünkür, nunga, pïngïr, koyem, khas, fas and ungtuwun); north Siberian type (ungtuwun, nimngangku, düngür, pyenzyer, peddi and khendir); Ob-Ugrian type (koyp, kuyup, pyenzyer and pyenshal); Amur type (ungtu, ungtukhu, ungchukhï, untsukhu, untuwun, dali and k'as); Kamchatkan type (yayar, yarar, ul'pa yaay, yerkeye, yalgil and ungtun); and Chukotkan type (sayak, saquyak and yarar; fig.15).

Peoples of the Amur and Sakhalin regions use a framed rattle tambourine with a fish-skin membrane as an accompaniment to women's dances during the bear ceremony. During Buddhist rituals various drums are used by the Buryats and Tuvans. Siberian Tatars use the kettledrums of Inner Asia. A unique membranophone is the large frame-mounted drum made from the entire hide of a sacrificed horse, held by an angular support or stretched over a square frame. This is found among Sakhas who call it a tabïk, Buryats (zükheli), Teleuts (baydara) and Khakasses (tayïgh).

(d) Chordophones. The musical bow has an almost overall distribution in the region. Among the Samoyedic peoples, Yukagirs and Yuits it is used instead of the jew's harp, while among the Ob-Ugrians, Selkups, Kets, northern and Amur Tunguses, Chukchi-Koryak, Yupik-Aleuts and the Kamchatkan peoples it is known as the women's jew's harp. Among the northern and southern Altai Turks, Kuznetsk Turks, Sayan Turks and Khakasses it is used by shamans for divination.

Varieties of bowed lutes are also found: the spike fiddle of the Tuvans, Buryats, Sakhas, Amur-Tunguses, Nivkhs and Chukotkan-Kamchatkan peoples; a bowed lute made from a single piece of wood among the Ob-Ugrians, Selkups, Kets, Siberian Tatars, southern Altai Turks, Khakasses, Sayan Turks, Buryats, Sakhas, Evenkis, Nanays, Chukchis, Yuits and Itelmens (fig.16*a*). A box-shaped bowed lute with the neck and resonator made from separate pieces of wood is found among the Ob-Ugrians, Selkups, Kets, Siberian Tatars, southern Altai Turks, Khakasses, Sayan Turks, Buryats, Sakhas and Evenkis (fig.16*b*).

The most complex chordophones are played in southern and western Siberia: the plucked box lute among the Khantys, Selkups, Siberian Tatars, southern and northern Altai Turks, Kuznetsk Turks, Khakasses, Sayan Turks, Buryats and Sakhas; the oblong hollowed-out five string lyre (zither variants also exist) among the Ob-Ugrians and Selkups; the oblong seven-string box zither with movable bridges among the Khakasses (where it is known as the chatkhan), Sayan Turks, southern Altai Turks, Siberian Tatars and Buryats. A unique chordophone is the angle harp of the Ob-Ugrians, known as the tarïg-sïp-yiw, torop-yukh, tor-sapl-yukh, taren-sapt-yuk, taregh-ogher-yuk and toorïgh-oup-yukh, and the pyngkyr among the Selkups.

(vi) Research. Information on the music of Siberian peoples came first from travellers in the 17th century, and then particularly from Russian ethnographers at the turn of the 19th century: V.G. Bogoraz-Tan and V.I. Iokhel'son who worked with peoples of north-eastern Siberia; S.M. Shirokogorov with the Tungus peoples; L.Ya. Shternberg with the Nivkhs; F.Ya. Kon with the Turkic peoples of central Siberia; and A.A. Dunin-Gorkavich with the peoples of the Ob' region. The most wide-ranging collections of field materials were made by the Russian ethnomusicologist Igor' Bogdanov, beginning in the 1950s and published as recordings between the 1970s and 90s. Since the 1980s researchers from the Novosibirsk conservatory have carried out extensive fieldwork with various Siberian peoples, especially in central and eastern Siberia.

(vii) 20th-century developments During the 20th century, beginning in the Soviet period, urban music infrastructures (such as the conservatory and music school system) have strengthened Siberian contacts with Western music. This has resulted in Siberian professional practitioners of Western music (e.g. in the works of the Nenets composer Semyon Nyaruy) and the appropriation of local traditions into the Western system of 'folkloristic' music. Opera and ballet companies have been established in the Buryat and Sakha republics, musical theatres in the republics of Altai, Khakassia and Tuva, and music and dance ensembles in the regions of the Koryaks ('Mengo'), Chukchis ('Ergïron'), Khantys and Mansis ('Misne') and Evenkis ('Osiktakan'). In Buryatia, Sakha, Khakassia and Tuva, technologies associated with contemporary Western composition have become significant. There are about 1000 primary music schools, more than 30 music colleges and four higher music institutions (in Novosibirsk, Krasnoyarsk, Yakutsk and Vladivostok) in Siberia.

During the 1990s, with the popularization of overtone-singing, musical fusions and neo-shamanism, some Tuvan artists and groups, e.g. Sainkho Namchylak, Kongar-ool Ondar, Huun-Huur-Tu, Yat-Kha and Shu-De, and Sakha artists and groups such as Stepanida Borisova, Ay-Tal, Serge, Cholbon and Choroon, have gained international success.

Russo, William (Joseph) [Bill] (b Chicago, 25 June 1928). American composer and jazz musician. He studied with Konitz (1941–5) and Tristano (1943–7), playing the trombone in jazz bands. From 1950 to 1954 he was associated with the Stan Kenton Orchestra as a trombonist and composer-arranger. He studied English literature at Roosevelt College, Chicago, where he took private composition lessons with John J. Becker (1953–5) and K.B. Jirák (1955–7). In 1958 he won a grant from the Koussevitzky Foundation and moved to New York where he formed and conducted the Russo Orchestra. He has taught at the School of Jazz, Lenox, Massachusetts (1957–60), the Manhattan School of Music (1959–61), Columbia College, Chicago (1965–7, from 1979), and Antioch College (1971–2). In 1975 he became composer-in-residence for the city and county of San Francisco, a post he held for several years. He has also founded and directed several new-music and theatre programmes including the Center for New Music and Free Theater at Columbia College (1965–75) and the Rock Theater at the Peabody Institute (1969–71). In 1991 he formed the Chicago Jazz Ensemble.

Russo has an extensive and varied background as a composer. His musical style, in which melody is predominant, is influenced by his experience as a jazz musician; almost all of his works are jazz-informed, using colourful scorings and lively rhythms. An eclectic mix of diverse elements, such as the blues and the classical orchestra, and a diverse range of genres, from rock cantatas to classical symphonies, is characteristic of his musical language. This diversity, however, has a common denominator: his love for the human voice and for the theatre. Such works as Carousel Suite (1975) (drawn from the film score Everybody Rides the Carousel) employ thematic material that undergoes continuous transformation evocative of jazz improvisation techniques. His rock cantatas show a successful fusion of rock, opera, dance, jazz, lightshow and mime in a highly improvisatory style. Later operas combine Broadway, blues and soft-rock idioms, employing a combination of modal and jazz-influenced harmonies. Russo has also written several books on jazz composition and arranging, and has had a profound effect on the music curriculum at Columbia College, where a programme he designed exposes a heterogeneous student population to black music.

JAMES P. CASSARO

Russolo, Luigi (b Portogruaro, 30 April 1885; d Cerro di Laveno, Varese, 6 Feb 1947). Italian inventor, painter and composer. Although from a musical family, he joined the futurist movement in 1910 as a painter. Inspired by the violent reception of Pratella's Musica futurista, in 1913 he published the radical manifesto L'arte dei rumori. This advocated the creation of a music in which everyday sounds, including noise, are used in a non-imitative manner. With his assistant Ugo Piatti, he constructed intonarumori (noise intoners) between 1913 and 1921 with which he put his theories into practice (see illustration). These instruments were mostly based on the principle of the HURDY GURDY; the instrument was housed in a brightly painted box and the performer turned a crank or pressed an electric button at the rear to operate it; pitch was controlled by a lever on the top. By the end of 1913, 15 such machines, bearing onomatopoeic names such as the scoppiatore (exploder) and the ululatore (howler), had been constructed and demonstrated in Modena. The following year saw performances in Milan (resulting in a riot), Genoa and at the Coliseum in London. Russolo's compositions for these concerts, none of which have survived, bore suitably futurist titles such as Risveglio di una città and Convegno di automobile e aeroplani, and were written in his specially devised graphic notation. During World War I Russolo served with the Lombard Volunteer Cyclist Battalion and was badly injured. In a book published in 1916, also entitled L'arte dei rumori, he further developed his ideas of noise music.

Three controversial concerts took place in Paris in 1921; music by Russolo, his brother Antonio and Nuccio Fiorda was performed by 27 intonarumori alongside a full orchestra. The performances had considerable impact on Casella, Falla, Honegger, Milhaud, Ravel and Stravinsky, all of whom attended. Diaghilev and Mondrian were also impressed by the machines: Diaghilev's enthusiasm for all aspects of futurist performance resulted in discussions with Ravel and Stravinsky about projects to include the intonarumori, which did not come to fruition, while Mondrian wrote a lengthy critique of futurist music. During the 1920s Russolo developed other new instruments: the arco enarmonico (enharmonic bow), which obtained unusual sonorities from conventional string instruments, and the rumorarmonio or russolofono, a rudimentary keyboard instrument equivalent to several combined intonarumori. Although the latter instrument was introduced to the public by Varèse in Paris in 1929 and was later used to accompany silent films in the cinema Studio 28, plans to mass-produce the rumorarmonio never came to fruition. Russolo was also involved in futurist cinema, providing music for the now lost Futuristi a Parigi, Montparnasse and La marche des machines. Between 1927 and 1932 Russolo lived in Paris as a refugee from fascism but returned to Italy after a few years spent in Spain. He was distanced from the later period of futurist activity by his anti-fascist politics; his interest turned to Eastern philosophies and the occult, and he resumed painting.

The loss of both the intonarumori and Russolo's compositions makes it difficult to judge the extent to which his theories were successfully realized. Ear-witness accounts are contradictory and the only extant recording, that of the arrangement of Antonio Russolo's Serenata and Corale (1924, Voce del Padrone R6919), for intonarumori and orchestra by A. Russolo) is very primitive. The initial enthusiasm of composers in the 1920s soon gave way to a lack of interest; only after World War II with the development of musique concrète and Cage's sonically inclusive aesthetic has the significance of Russolo's activities been fully understood.

FLORA DENNIS

Rust. German family of musicians.

(1) Friedrich Wilhelm Rust (b Wörlitz, nr Dessau, 6 July 1739; d Dessau, 28 Feb 1796). Composer and musical organizer. As a small child he learnt to play the violin, encouraged by his elder brother Johann Ludwig Anton, who was himself considered an excellent violinist. He also learnt the piano, and according to his own account in his autobiography (MS, 1775, D-DEsa) could play the first part of J.S. Bach's Das wohltemperirte Clavier from memory when he was 16. After his father's death in 1751 he lived with his mother and eldest brother in Gröbzig until 1755. A copy that he made of the trio sonata from Bach's Musical Offering dates from this period; it is now considered lost. He then attended the Lutheran Gymnasium in Cöthen, 1755–8. From 1758 he studied law at Halle-Wittenberg University; he also had lessons with W.F. Bach and in return deputized for him as a church organist. Soon after Rust had completed his studies there, Prince Leopold Friedrich Franz of Anhalt-Dessau sent him to Zerbst to study with Carl Höckh, and then to Berlin and Potsdam (July 1763–April 1764) to study the violin with Franz Benda and keyboard instruments with C.P.E. Bach. In 1765–6 Rust visited Italy in the prince's retinue, and there completed his musical training, coming into contact with Tartini, Pietro Nardini and G.B. Martini.

Rust then settled in Dessau, where a lively court and civic musical life soon developed under his influence, and he wrote most of his compositions for it. From 1769 he organized regular subscription concerts, with music performed by both court musicians and amateurs, and in 1775 a theatre was founded, a project for which Rust was largely responsible. His achievements were recognized in April 1775, when the prince made him court music director. He married his former singing pupil Henriette Niedhardt in May; the couple had eight children, two of whom became professional musicians.

In his lifetime Rust was honoured and esteemed as an instrumentalist and composer; contemporary lexicons and his correspondence with colleagues bear eloquent witness to this. He was also active as a teacher, and trained a series of well-regarded instrumentalists and singers. His compositions comprise all musical genres of the time except the symphony. The surviving instrumental music includes works for clavichord, viola d'amore, harp, lute, and nail violin, the sound of which appealed to his introverted nature. In addition to large-scale vocal works and six stage works he also wrote some 100 lieder, of which 70 have been made usable for modern performance (see Buchmann, 1987). His output is representative of the transition to Classicism, and certain elements, particularly in his lieder and keyboard works, anticipate developments by later composers; his keyboard music is especially individual. Many of Rust's compositions still await rediscovery.

(2) Wilhelm Karl Rust (b Dessau, 29 April 1787; d Dessau, 18 April 1855). Pianist, son of (1) Friedrich Wilhelm Rust. As early as 1793 his extraordinary talents were praised by J.G. Naumann in the Berliner musikalische Zeitung (28 December), under the headline 'A New Musical Child Prodigy'. In 1805–6, while he was studying philosophy in Halle, he was a pupil of D.G. Türk. From 1807 he lived in Vienna, where Beethoven formed a high opinion of his piano playing, especially his interpretation of Bach, and introduced him into Viennese society as a piano teacher; from 1819 to 1827 he was also organist of the Protestant church in Vienna. After returning to Dessau he confined himself to teaching.

(3) Wilhelm Rust (b Dessau, 15 Aug 1822; d Leipzig, 2 May 1892). Editor and composer, grandson of (1) Friedrich Wilhelm Rust. A son of Karl Ludwig Rust (1786–1874), a lawyer, he studied the piano and organ with his uncle, (2) Wilhelm Karl Rust, and from 1840 to 1843 attended music classes given by the Dessau court Kapellmeister, Friedrich Schneider. He then lived with the family of the Hungarian Baron Lonyay as a music teacher, 1845–9. From 1849 to 1878 he was active in Berlin, where he became organist at the Lukaskirche in 1861, directed the Bach-Verein from 1862 to 1875, and taught at the Stern Conservatory from 1870. He was an editor of the Johann Sebastian Bach' Werke (Leipzig, 1851–99/R) from 1853, in 1858 becoming chief editor. In 1878 Rust was appointed organist of the Thomaskirche in Leipzig, and he became a teacher at the Leipzig Conservatory at the same time. The climax of his career came with his appointment as Kantor of the Thomasschule in 1880. For his numerous contributions to Bach studies he received many honours, including an appointment as royal Prussian music director (1864).

Rust achieved an eminence still undisputed today as the editor of 26 volumes of the Johann Sebastian Bach's Werke (1855–81), which were models of critical musical editions. In his editions of the works of his grandfather, (1) Friedrich Wilhelm, however, he abandoned this meticulous scholarship, and his attitude to them still casts a shadow over his work as a whole. Rust's own compositions include polyphonic sacred songs with piano or organ accompaniment, solo and choral songs and works for piano and organ; some of them appeared in print (see MCL).

LUTZ BUCHMANN

Rust [Rusti], Giacomo (b Rome, 1741; d Barcelona, 1786). Italian composer. He was perhaps of German descent, but was not related to F.W. Rust. He studied in Naples at the Turchini Conservatory and later in Rome under Rinaldo di Capua. From 1763 to 1777 he worked in Venice, where he brought out his first opera, La contadina in corte (1763). Between 1772 and 1776 he produced 12 more (two in collaboration). It was probably the popularity of these works in Italy that led the Archbishop of Salzburg to engage him for his court cappella, offering him 1000 gulden, an unusually high salary for Salzburg. Rust was appointed court Kapellmeister on 12 June 1777, but at the end of the year he asked to be relieved of his post, because the bad weather had affected his health. His plea was granted, but his ill-health allowed him to leave only in February 1778. Just before his departure he set Metastasio's Il Parnaso confuso for the consecration of the Archbishop of Olmütz. In Rust's absence the performance was conducted by Michael Haydn. Although Rust had been offered the post of maestro di cappella at Orvieto Cathedral, he returned to Venice and resumed his operatic career. In 1783 he became maestro de capilla at Barcelona Cathedral, where he remained until his death. (P. D'Ambrosa: Le opere di Giacomo Rust su testi metastasiani (1780–1783), Pavia, 1992)

THOMAS BAUMAN, ERNST HINTERMAIER

Ruta, Gilda (b Naples, 13 Oct 1856; d New York, 27 Oct 1932). Italian pianist, composer and singer. She studied with her father, then with Liszt in Rome and became one of the most distinguished pianists of the 19th-century Neapolitan school. Francesco Florimo mentions her as a singer in 1876. After an early dêbut in Naples, she embarked on a period of intense activity as a concert pianist, eventually performing in New York where she settled in 1896 and devoted herself to teaching the piano and composing. Her works include a Piano Concerto, Bolero and Andante rondò for piano and strings, a Violin Sonata, pieces for solo piano and songs. Some instrumental compositions show the influence of Classical style; in others the melodic vein is reminiscent of Chopin (in the Allegro appassionato for piano; Milan, 1884) and in keeping with the trend followed by pianists of the Neapolitan school. The simpler style of the late 19th-century Italian romanza and canzone is apparent in songs such as Alle stelle, Canzone marinaresca and Voglio guarire. Ruta was awarded a gold medal at the 1890 international exhibition of Florence for her vocal and orchestral works. Some of her piano pieces were published by Lucca and Ricordi and were favourably reviewed by Filippo Filippi, music critic of La perseveranza in Milan.

Ruta's mother, Emilia Sutton, was an English singer; her father, Michele Ruta (b Caserta, 7 Feb 1816; d Naples, 24 Jan 1896), was a composer and director of the Naples Conservatory. From 1850 he was music critic of the Corriere del mattino of Naples and in 1855 founder of the journal La musica. Among his compositions are the operas Leonilda (1854), Maria la fioraia (1859), Diana di Vitry (1859), L'impresario in progetto (1873), Marco Bozzari and Caterina (both unperformed), a cantata, songs, two masses, a requiem and a Te Deum. He also wrote a number of pedagogical works and in 1877 published Storia critica delle condizioni della musica in Italia e del Conservatorio di S Pietro a Majella di Napoli.

Rutge, Daniel. German musician, possibly identifiable with DANIEL SPEER.

Ruth. German family of mechanical organ builders. Andreas Ruth (b Waldkirch, 26 May 1817) learned his trade with the firm of BRUDER, and began by making musical clocks. In 1841 he established his own organ-building firm, working with his brothers Michael, Josef and Xaver. The firm was incorporated as A. Ruth & Sohn on 23 October 1887, and under the management of Andreas's son Adolf (i) (b 21 April 1845) and grandson Adolf (ii) (b 18 Feb 1878; d 26 Feb 1938) the enterprise prospered until it became a victim of the recession of the 1930s. The firm built street, dance and fairground organs. Their musical arrangements were always superb and in keeping with the 'Waldkirch school' established by such makers as Imhof, Bruder and Gavioli.

Ruthström, (Bror Olof) Julius (b Stugun, Jämtland, 30 Dec 1877; d Stockholm, 2 April 1944). Swedish violinist and pedagogue. His father, Gustaf Adolf Ruthström (b Strömstad, 8 Feb 1860; *d c*1903), was a military musician and for some time a member of the Hovkapell in Stockholm. With the aid of a scholarship from King Oskar II, Julius studied at the Musikhochschule in Berlin under Burmester, Moser and Joachim (1901–3), where he was awarded the Joachim Prize. He gave Reger's solo violin sonata op.42 no.1 its first performance in 1904, and was thereafter frequently engaged as a soloist throughout Germany. He also appeared as a soloist in Göteborg with W. Stenhammar, and made frequent tours of Sweden and other Scandinavian and European countries. He was an active chamber musician and had his own string quartet for about 20 years. He was elected to the Swedish Royal Academy of Music in 1912. As director of the Mellersta Sveriges Kammarmusikförening (1928–35), he did much to further the performance of chamber music in Sweden.

Ruthström was a persuasive advocate of Swedish music and an influential teacher. His repertory was unusually large, and he was famed for his performances of Reger, Sibelius's concerto and a variety of contemporary music. He wrote a number of technical studies for the violin.

ROBERT LAYTON

Rutini, Ferdinando (b Nov or Dec 1763; d Terracina, 13 Nov 1827). Italian composer, son of Giovanni Marco Rutini. He was apparently born during one of his father's temporary engagements outside Florence, and was probably the son whose birth his father announced in a letter of 3 December 1763 to Padre Martini. Although Rutini was not to become as prolific a composer of keyboard music as his father, his earliest dated works are for cembalo pianoforte: two sets of sonatas, a capriccio and a trio with strings, 1784–8. The Gazzetta toscana referred to the set of Tre sonate (1784) as his 'first work'. He was employed as cembalist (and therefore director of the orchestra) in two theatres mounting opera in Florence: beginning in 1786 at the theatre in the via S Maria, and from 1789 at both the S Maria and the Intrepidi. From 1795 to 1798 he served as second cembalist at the Cocomero.

Rutini's operatic composition came to public notice in March 1786 when he added a trio to a production of Cimarosa's Italiana in Londra at the theatre in the Corso de' Tintori. The first of his full theatrical works reached the stage three years later with the intermezzo Amor non ha riguardi at the Cocomero and the dramma giocoso L'avaro at the Valle in Rome. According to Gervasoni, he composed a cantata for a wedding in Florence in the same year and also sang the principal part.

From 1789 to 1800 Rutini completed 36 works in the genres of intermezzo, farce and dramma giocoso; all but seven opened in the various Florentine theatres, the Cocomero, Piazza Vecchia, Pergola, S Maria, Borgo Ognissanti and Intrepidi. In the 1790s, at the height of his popularity, six new operas by Rutini were produced in a single year. His most successful comic opera was the two-act dramma giocoso Il matrimonio per industria, performed at the Pergola in June 1792. It was later presented in Varese, Cremona and Milan. Rutini's activities were not limited to opera. The Gazzetta toscana mentioned overtures and a scena ed aria in concerts of the Armonici academy in 1793 and 1794, and the publication in 1796 of a concerto for pianoforte (now lost). It also advertised the opening of his music school in 1798.

Rutini's activities after 1800 are less well documented. Four new operas and an earlier work reached the Florentine stage between 1801 and 1806, although by 1804 he had apparently assumed the post of maestro di cappella in Ancona. The reasons for this move to a church position in a less prestigious musical centre are unknown. The Tre ore di agonia di N.S. in the Ancona library, and extant motets for solo voices and instruments, two prepared by the Roman music seller Giovanni Jubilli, indicate his attention to church music. From 1812 to 1816 he was maestro di cappella in Macerata.

In 1816 and 1817 Rutini resumed composition for the stage but apparently without real success. He produced three operas in Rome, two for the Teatro Apollo and one for the Argentina; the latter was especially criticized, even by its librettist. His whereabouts in the next three years are unknown although a performance of his earlier farce, La pianella perduta, took place at the Teatro Re in Milan in May 1820. He was maestro di cappella in Aquapendente from 1820 to 1825, and then, until his death, in Terracina.

Ferdinando Rutini may be regarded as the culmination and termination of the Florentine comic operatic tradition extending from Jacopo Melani in the 17th century to the Napoleonic era. Of the Florentine opera composers of his generation he was the most prolific, but his legacy is small: only six scores out of 44 comic operas exist today. These are remarkably similar in content and style: each score for five or six singers accompanied by strings, a pair of oboes, horns and continuo; chorus is added in one work. The melodies are attractive, the harmonic palette is not charged and it is above all in the dramatic pacing and varieties of comic invention that the operas charm. Other undated compositions include a violin sonata, a concerto for guitar and an organ polacca.

ROBERT LAMAR WEAVER/SUSAN PARISI

Rutini, Giovanni Marco [Giovanni Maria; Giovanni Placido] (b Florence, 25 April 1723; d Florence, 22 Dec 1797). Italian composer. In April 1739 he was admitted to the Conservatorio della Pietà dei Turchini in Naples, where he studied composition with Leo, the harpsichord with F.N. Fago and the violin with V.A. Pagliarulo. He probably finished his studies in 1744, but remained for a few years as maestrino before returning to Florence. In 1748 he was at Prague, where he signed the dedication of his Sonate per cembalo op.1 on 15 July. Together with the composer Francesco Zoppis, he was engaged for the G.B. Locatelli company. His first and second operas, Alessandro nell'Indie (1750) and Semiramide (1752), were performed by the company at the Nuovo Teatro, Prague. Perhaps while travelling with the company, he was in Dresden in 1754 and Berlin about 1756. According to a letter to Padre Martini in 1772, at the time he lived in Prague he was under the protection of Maria Antonia Walpurgis, Electress of Saxony, who wrote the text of his cantata Lavinia e Turno (1756). In Prague he also composed the sets of sonatas opp.2 and 3, the latter dedicated to his pupil the Countess of Nostitz and Rhyeneck.

The Locatelli company failed financially in 1757, but Locatelli obtained a new contract with Empress Elizabeth of Russia as impresario of the court theatre in St Petersburg. Rutini moved there and composed Il retiro degli dei (1757), and in the summer of 1758 the company mounted his first comic opera, Il negligente. The sonatas opp.5 and 6 were produced in St Petersburg (but published by Haffner in Nuremberg), as was his setting of Metastasio's Grazie a gl'inganni tuoi (1758). Rutini won appreciation in St Petersburg high society, becoming harpsichord teacher to the Grand Duchess Fyodorovich (later Catherine II) and living with Count Pyotr Borisovich Sheremet'yev, whose private orchestra he conducted. In February 1761 Locatelli's second company failed and was dispersed. Rutini returned to Florence and married on 2 April. In 1762 he began a correspondence with Martini, which lasted until 1780 through more than 40 letters (in I-Bc), useful for biographical information and documenting Rutini's desire to train himself in counterpoint. At Martini's suggestion he began a translation of Marpurg's Abhandlung von der Fuge (as Traité de la fugue, MS, I-Bc). In January 1762 his Il caffè di campagna was performed in Bologna and in March he was admitted to the Accademia Filarmonica there.

The earliest recorded performance of an opera by Rutini in Florence is that of Gli sposi in maschera – previously produced in Cremona and Bologna – at S Maria on 3 October 1763. In May 1764 he was in Livorno for the première there of Ezio and in Genoa during the following summer for the investiture of Francesco Maria della Rovere for which he wrote a cantata. In the next decade he travelled throughout Italy to direct performances of his music, but maintained his home and his principal activity in Florence. With his intermezzo Le contese domestiche (1766), Rutini was recognized in the Gazzetta toscana as the city's most internationally eminent composer. But a position at the Tuscan court never materialized, despite the acclaimed brilliance of his music for L'amor per rigiro (1773), which was mounted in the grand duke's summer palace at Poggio a Caiano. However, performances in Modena in 1769 of L'olandese in Italia and of the première in the following carnival season of la Nitteti won him the title of Maestro di cappella al Principe ereditario di Modena. Rutini did not give up residence in Florence, however, perhaps hoping to become maestro di cappella to the Grand Duke Leopold (to whom he dedicated the harpsichord sonatas op.8 in 1774). The climax of Rutini's Florentine productions came with Vologeso, re de' Parti, which the Notizie del mondo praised extravagantly. His next Florentine performance, Zulima (1777), a revision of Sicotencal (1776), was his last operatic work save one revival of L'amor per rigiro in Pontremoli in 1779. He continued to direct performances at the Intrepidi up to 1784, but composed mainly oratorios and keyboard sonatas. From 1780 he also devoted himself to sacred music (a Kyrie and a Gloria for four voices are in manuscript in Berlin), and the Gazzetta toscana also gives the titles of some oratorios not mentioned elsewhere.

The historical importance of Rutini's production for harpsichord is remarkable. The Rutini sonata, typical of the age of the transition from the harpsichord to the piano, has a variable number of movements, sometimes having two quick ones together and often ending with a minuet. Its thematic incisiveness and expressive chiaroscuro give it an important place in the development of the Classical style. The interest that Mozart took in Rutini is demonstrated by a letter from Leopold, who on 18 August 1771 asked his son to send him some 'good sonatas by Rutini' (Torrefranca thought they could be identified as nos.2 and 6 of op.6), but even more obvious is the stylistic inheritance that Rutini left in the first of Haydn's piano compositions. His sonatas can be divided into two groups: the first, comprising opp.1–6, attracted the attention of Torrefranca, who emphasized Rutini's position as a forerunner of Mozart and even of Beethoven. Many of the dramatic contrasts that Torrefranca related to Beethoven's style (for example, in considering the first sonata of op.1) seem to be derived from theatrical gestures; these may be serious in character, as in the pathetic interruptions on arpeggios of the diminished 7th, or 'recitatives', in the second sonata of op.1, or they may be comic or affettuoso, as in the broken phrasing that recalls the languors and caprices of Pergolesi's La serva padrona and thus looks back to Rutini's Neapolitan training. Archaisms are not entirely lacking, such as the toccata that opens the first sonata of op.3, but pages given over entirely to insipid Alberti basses (as in op.3 no.2 and op.5 no.3) are rare.

Expressive tension is less frequent in the second group of sonatas, beginning with op.7, which inaugurated a simple, linear style of writing ('I have attempted to avoid all complexity', wrote the author in the preface). These new sonatas are introduced by a brief 'tuning-up' prelude and often end with a simple balletto, thus taking on the outward appearance of sonatinas, forerunners of Clementi's. The last sonata of op.8 ends with an arietta 'Clori amabile', to be sung by the player. All these late works have been regarded as the worn-out product of concessions to the hedonistic taste of the period, in spite of the fact that it is in these sonatas (particularly in opp.7–9) that, by renouncing abundant Rococo ornamentation, progress was made towards a style better suited to the piano, and sometimes towards a supple effectiveness that was more mature than the expressiveness of many earlier works.

Rutini's operas await detailed study. As a teacher, he was one of the founders of the Leopoldian school of Florentine composers, which included his son Ferdinando, and fostered the flowering of late 18th-century Florentine opera singers, among them the tenor Bernardo Mengozzi. Only Della Corte has commented on his operas, citing the grace of the arias and the skill in capturing a variety of moods found in his I matrimoni in maschera.

GIORGIO PESTELLI, ROBERT LAMAR WEAVER

Rutkowski, Antoni Wincenty (b Warsaw, 21 Jan 1859; d Warsaw, 14 Dec 1886). Polish composer, pianist and teacher. He began studying music in 1869 at the Warsaw Music Institute, where he was a pupil of Moniuszko (harmony), Żeleński (counterpoint), Janothy (piano) and Wecke (horn). After graduating in 1876 he became a piano teacher at the institute, also working as a pianist and composer. From 1881 to 1883 he studied with Noskowski. In ten years of intensive work as a composer, he concentrated on instrumental music; his compositions include sets of piano variations, a Violin Sonata op.5, a Piano Trio op.13 and a set of variations for string quartet. He also composed five solo songs and three choral pieces.

TADEUSZ PRZYBYLSKI

Rutkowski, Bronisław (b Komaje, nr Vilnius, 27 Feb 1898; d Leipzig, 1 June 1964). Polish organist, teacher, conductor, composer and writer on music. He studied music at the St Petersburg Conservatory with Handschin (organ), Kalafati and Vītols (theory). From 1921 he studied at the Warsaw Conservatory with Surzyński (organ), Rytel and Statkowski (theory) and Melcer (conducting), graduating in 1924 with distinction. From 1924 to 1926 he continued his studies in Paris with Vierne (organ) and Pirro (aesthetics), and from 1926 to 1939 he taught the organ at the Warsaw Conservatory. He also directed music theatre, edited Muzyka polska, broadcast on Polish radio, and was organist at Warsaw Cathedral. From 1946 he lived in Kraków, where he taught the organ and from 1955 to 1964 was rector of the State Music High School. As an organist he gave concerts in many countries in Europe. He wrote many organ and choral works.

BOGUSŁAW SCHÄFFER

Rutter, John (b London, 1945). English composer, conductor and editor. He was a chorister at Highgate School, following which he studied music at Clare College, Cambridge. He then taught at the University of Southampton, returning to Clare College as the director of music in 1975. In 1979 he left to devote himself to composition and subsequently to found the Cambridge Singers, a professional choir with whom he has made many recordings, both of his own music and of other (mainly European) choral works. Rutter has concentrated on composing vocal music, particularly for choirs. Within this field he has become probably the most popular and widely performed composer of his generation, especially in the UK and the USA. His idiom grows out of the British choral tradition as exemplified by Holst, Vaughan Williams, Howells, Britten and Tippett, but also draws on a wider sympathy for European music of the later 19th and early 20th centuries, especially the harmonic and melodic language of Fauré, Duruflé and their contemporaries. Rutter's particular gift is for skilled craftsmanship and memorable phrase, found at its simplest in works such as the anthem A Gaelic Blessing, at its most introspective in the Requiem. If his music typically breathes a gentle and melodious spirit, it can also be joyful, rhythmic and fleet, these elements combining in the expansive Gloria (1974) and Magnificat (1990). In addition to large-scale sacred choral works and anthems, Rutter has also produced a large output of Christmas music, both as arranger and composer, his most familiar pieces being the Shepherd's Pipe Carol and Star Carol. There is also a significant body of secular choral music building on the English partsong tradition, as in the two choral cycles Fancies and When Icicles Hang. Rutter's editorial work includes, with Sir David Willcocks, the volumes two, three and four of Carols for Choirs (Oxford, 1970, 1978, 1980) and the performing edition of the 1893 version of Fauré's Requiem (Oxford, 1984).

Ruvo, Giulio (de) (fl ?Naples, 1703–16). Italian composer, probably of Apulian origin (his surname, widespread in Apulia, indicates the family's ancient provenance from Ruvo, near Bari). He was probably active in Naples and its kingdom, and like other Neapolitan composers, he dedicated several compositions to the Duke of Bovino, an Apulian nobleman who was also resident in Naples. Other indications that he was active in Naples are his use of the tarantella, the inscription 'Napoli' at the end of his second romanella, the mention of the shores of Mergellina (on the northern outskirts of Naples) in his serenata Dori, Nisa, Nerina, and the use of the term 'alla spagnola' in the serenata Lucina, Gloria et Cervaro and in the aria Se l'amarti è colpa o cara. The easy cantabile of his melodies and his use of the lowered second are also characteristic of the Neapolitan school. His cello sonatas contain tempo indications such as 'piano' and 'amoroso' that were also used by Alessandro Scarlatti in his cello sonatas and by Domenico Sarro ('amoroso' only) in his cantatas. The brilliant writing in these sonatas, technically adventurous for their time, reveals Ruvo's familiarity with the cello, an instrument on which he was probably a virtuoso. His name appears as 'Don Giulio di Ruvo' in his three-part balletto of 1716, suggesting that he had perhaps taken holy orders.

Ruwet, Nicolas (b Saive, 31 Dec 1932). French linguist, literary critic and musical analyst of Belgian birth. He studied Romance philology at the University of Liège; he was a pupil of Lévi-Strauss and Benveniste at the Ecole Pratique de Hautes Etudes, Paris, and of Jakobson and Chomsky at the department of linguistics at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. In addition, he studied music privately. In 1968 he was appointed professor of linguistics at the University of Paris at Vincennes. Though not primarily a musicologist, he has been a fundamental thinker in the field of the SEMIOTICS of music, contributing a series of formative articles (notably 'Méthodes d'analyse en musicologie'), five of which have since been published collectively in Langage, musique, poésie (Paris, 1972). The Festschrift De la musique à la linguistique: hommages à Nicolas Ruwet, ed. L. Tasmowski and A. Zribi-Hertz (Ghent, 1992), published to mark his 60th birthday, contains a list of publications.

Ruyneman, Daniel (b Amsterdam, 8 Aug 1886; d Amsterdam, 25 July 1963). Dutch composer. From 1913 to 1916 he studied at the Amsterdam Conservatory with De Jong (piano) and Zweers (composition). With Dresden and Zagwijn he set up the Dutch Society for the Advancement of Modern Music (1918) in order to draw attention to a young generation of composers through concerts. This society was absorbed by the later Dutch section of the ISCM (1923). In the 1920s he worked in Groningen, where he maintained close contacts with the group of Expressionistic artists known as 'De Ploeg' [The Plough]. Back in Amsterdam he set up the Dutch Society for Contemporary Music (1930), a concert society which he directed until 1962. He was also editor-in-chief of the society's journal Maandblad voor hedendaagsche muziek (1931–41). In 1931 he became general secretary of the Permanent Commission for International Exchange Concerts set up by him and the Austrian composer and conductor Hans Pless, an organization to promote performances of new music in Europe and in the USA. From 1952 until his death he organized a highly original series of concerts in the Amsterdam Stedelijk Museum. He championed composers such as Boulez, Stockhausen, Henze, Ton de Leeuw and Schat with the controversial 'Experimental Music' series (1959–61).

Ruyneman's earliest works are influenced by Grieg, Skryabin and above all Debussy and Ravel. The Chineesche liederen (1917) represent a breakthrough in his search for an idiom of his own. His music acquires a quasi-improvisational character and from the harmonic point of view the structure is determined by accumulations of 5ths. In 1918 he put himself in the forefront of the Dutch musical avant garde with two works: Hiëroglyphen, a composition for an ensemble with a colourful and unusual strength, and De roep, for chamber choir a cappella, in which no text but various vowels and consonants are sung. He continued the development of the idea of vocal colour polyphony in the Sonata for Chamber Choir (1931). From the middle of the 1920s he focussed less explicitly on the exploration of sound and more on melodic-linear and formal aspects, for example in the chamber Divertimento (1927). During this period he also composed the opera De Karamazovs after Dostoyevsky and orchestrated and completed Musorgsky's The Marriage. Distinctly neo-classical tendencies are manifested chiefly in the 1930s and 40s, for example in the Partita for string orchestra and the Nightingales Quintet for wind. Evidence of the interest he developed in the last few years of his life in serial technique is contained in his four Réflexions (1959–61) for chamber music ensembles in various strengths. He is the author of De componist Jan Ingehoven (Amsterdam, 1938).

PAUL OP DE COUL

Ruzante. See BEOLCO, ANGELO.

Ruzicka, Peter (b Düsseldorf, 3 July 1948). German composer and arts administrator. While still at school he studied music at the Hamburg conservatory. After the Abitur (1968) he studied law, business, theatre and musicology in Munich, Hamburg and Berlin, gaining the doctorate in law in 1977. During the period 1979–87 he was the intendant of the Berlin RSO and in 1988 became the intendant of the Hamburg Staatsoper and Hamburg PO. He has received several composition prizes, including those of the International Rostrum of Composers (1971) and the International Gaudeamus Composers' Competition (1972). Since 1990 he has been professor of arts administration at the Hamburg Musikhochschule; other administrative roles include membership in the council of GEMA. In 1996 he became the artistic director of the Munich Biennale.

As a composer Ruzicka owes much to Henze and Hans Otte, with whom he studied for a short time in the late 1960s. A reaction to Adorno's philosophy led him to his concept of 'critical composing' (Krellman, 1976), writing music about music. This developed into his predominant interest as a composer. It is particularly in his confrontation with Mahler's music in works such as the viola concerto entitled '... den Impuls zum Weitersprechen erst empfinge' (1981) – a phrase taken from Adorno's monograph on Mahler – that his concern for 'question[ing] the material' is best exemplified.

DÖRTE SCHMIDT

Růžičková, Zuzana (b Plzeň, 14 Jan 1928). Czech harpsichordist. She was trained at the Prague Academy (where she joined the teaching staff in 1962), and first attracted attention by winning the Munich international competition in 1956. She has performed in several European countries, made a number of recordings (including two of Martinů's harpsichord concerto, and the complete keyboard works of J.S. Bach, characterized by musicality but rather free 'orchestrated' registration and heavy pointing of structure), and won a Grand Prix du Disque in 1961 (for Benda's G minor Concerto) and the Supraphon Grand Prix in 1968 and 1972. She was made Artist of Merit in 1969. A co-founder with Václav Neumann of the Prague Chamber Soloists, she played in it from 1962 to 1967, and in 1963 she formed a duo with the violinist Josef Suk. She is married to the composer Viktor Kalabis, whose piano concerto she has recorded. Her pupils include Christopher Hogwood.

Ruzitska, György (b Vienna, 1789; d Kolozsvár [now Cluj-Napoca, Romania], 2 Dec 1869). Hungarian composer and teacher of Austrian birth. The son of Wenzel Ruzitska, an english horn player at the Burgtheater in Vienna, he began studying music at the age of ten, taking piano lessons with Wenzel Müller, the organ with Pater Placidus, and composition with Josef Gelinek in Vienna. In 1810 he travelled to Transylvania as a music teacher to the family of Baron János Bánffy, but in 1819 he moved to Kolozsvár, where he remained until his death. He soon became a prominent personality in the town's musical life (in 1832, for instance, the young people of Kolozsvár organized a public demonstration against 'the piano teacher Ruzitska'). In the 1830s he became friendly with Ferenc Erkel. Ruzitska conducted the New Society of Music in Kolozsvár until 1835 and again from 1837. His name is also associated with the reorganization of the conservatory; he was its director from 1835 until his death, and in 1838 he published a singing manual for the students.

Among Ruzitska's more notable works are his three-act opera Alonso, performed in Pest in 1829, and the overture Zrinyi (*c*1830). In addition he wrote five masses, a requiem (1829, performed 1835), a Te Deum (1850), a symphony (1833), four string quartets and three string quintets. His Violin Sonata op.3 was published in Vienna in 1814, while the two Piano Trios op.4 and a Fantasy-sonata for piano op.6 appeared in Pest. In 1848, the year of the Hungarian Revolution, Ruzitska composed a setting of Petőfi's poem Nemzeti dal ('National song'). Other works in the Hungarian style are Introduction et variations brillantes sur un thème hongrois for cello and piano, and Phantasie und Variationen über ein ungarisches Thema for piano trio (1837).

Ruzitska, Ignác (b Bazin, 18 April 1777; d Veszprém, bur. 18 Feb 1833). Hungarian church musician and composer. The son of the regens chori in Bazin, József Ruzitska, he began his musical career in the 1780s, first as choirboy in Pozsony (now Bratislava) Cathedral and later as musicus dominalis to Count Mihály Viczay in Hédervár. About 1800 he was engaged as an orchestral violinist in the cathedral chapter orchestra in Veszprém; he was appointed Kapellmeister there in 1827. He also took part in the secular musical activities of Veszprém. A friend of the verbunkos composers Bihari and Csermák, he wrote down the Rákóczy March from Bihari's playing of it on the violin, and he was entrusted with Csermák's unpublished compositions shortly before the latter's death. His most significant achievement was the compilation of the Magyar nóták Veszprém vármegyéből ('Hungarian tunes from County Veszprém'), a 15-volume collection comprising 136 Hungarian dances for piano by contemporary composers (including 24 pieces from Ruzitska himself), which was one of the most important contemporary collections of verbunkos music in the first third of the 19th century and still serves as a very important source.

Ruzitska, József (b ?Pápa, *c*1775; d after 1823). Hungarian conductor and composer. About 1820 he was Kapellmeister of the Josephregiment in Nagyenyed. In 1821 he composed the music to the second part of the Singspiel Arany idők ('Golden ages') for the theatre in Debrecen. He lived in Nagyvárad (now Oradea, Romania) as a theatre musician (1821) and in Kolozsvár (now Cluj-Napoca, Romania) as Kapellmeister of the Hungarian theatre (1822–3). In the Christmas season of 1822 his two operas Béla futása ('Béla's Escape') and Kemény Simon avagy dicsőség a hazáért meghalni ('Simon Kemény, or It is Glorious to Die for the Fatherland') were performed for the first time at the theatre in Kolozsvár. After 1823, when he made a journey to Italy, no details about his life are known.

Despite the apparent brevity of his career, Ruzitska is a very important figure in the music history of his native land. His stage works mark the development of the most significant genre of romantic art music in Hungary, that of the historical opera. In this sense he was a spiritual ancestor of Erkel and Mosonyi. In his operas Ruzitska used elements of contemporary Italian and German opera, as well as those of popular national Hungarian dance music (verbunkos). The Hungarian parts of his operas show the influence of Bihari's music. With his topical historical themes and his endeavour to combine current international with popular national forms of musical expression, Ruzitska paved the way for Hungarian opera in the 19th century.

FERENC BÓNIS

Rwanda and Burundi. Two neighbouring republics in Central Africa.

1. Ethnicity, population and background. 2. Instrumental music. 3. Vocal genres. 4. Dance. 5. Musical characteristics. 6. Developments during the 1990s.

1. ETHNICITY, POPULATION AND BACKGROUND. Despite their differing contemporary political situations, the same three ethnic groups – the Hutu, Tutsi and Twa – are located in Rwanda and Burundi. From the 16th century the Tutsi kingdom of Rwanda has shared the history of Burundi. In both republics, the majority is Hutu, Bantu-speaking farmers culturally related to peoples of the Democratic Republic of the Congo who have been dominated by Tutsi dynasties since the 16th century when these cattle-breeders arrived in Rwanda from the north. The Tutsi conquered the area and founded a feudal kingdom, wielding absolute power over the other population groups although they represented only about 15% of the total population. In the late 19th century, both Rwanda and Burundi were under German control and from 1920–62 were moved to Belgian colonial rule. In 1959, a Hutu uprising destroyed the Tutsi feudal hierarchy and overthrew the monarchy. Violent inter-ethnic rivalry between the Hutus and Tutsis culminated in the near-genocide of the Rwandan Tutsis in 1994 after the Hutu president was assassinated.

The 'pygmean' Twa subsist mainly as hunters, living in the forests and volcanic regions of northern Rwanda, or as farmers and professional potters in central Rwanda. They form about 1% of the population. In addition to these three main groups, there are some small groups of Kiga and Hima (from Uganda) in northern Rwanda, and a group of Nyambo (from Tanzania) in south-eastern Rwanda.

The peoples of Rwanda and Burundi do not live in villages; each family occupies a hill or part of a hill which is cultivated or used for pasture. Agriculture and cattle-raising form the basis of the economy and there is almost no industry.

For centuries the royal court of the former Tutsi ruler or mwami and those of his major chiefs were centres of cultural life and musical performance. Several musical genres and instruments, even ensembles, were associated with the mwami. Among the symbols of royal power were the ingabe drums of Rwanda (Karinga, Mpatsibihungu, Kiragutse and Cyimumugizi) and the karyenda and rukinso drums of Burundi. In addition to these dynastic drums, several other types of drum were used during rituals relating to the mwami and the kingdom.

2. INSTRUMENTAL MUSIC. Musical instruments are few in Rwanda and Burundi in comparison with other central African regions, possibly because the peoples there show a marked preference for vocal genres. Nearly all instruments are played exclusively by men.

The herdsmen's notched flute, umwirongi in Rwanda and umwironke in Burundi, has two to four finger-holes and is played while herding cattle, or at night to pass the time. It is made from reed, bamboo or wood, and measures 30 to 50 cm. The ihembe, a side-blown antelope horn, is used as a signalling instrument for hunting and communal work; the trumpets used in the amakondera ensemble are side-blown and made of bamboo (fig.1).

There are two main types of membranophone: the cylindrical single-headed ingaraba drum of the Twa amakondera ensemble (fig.1), and the iñgoma (NGOMA) drum with two skins laced together (fig.2) in Rwanda and single pegged heads in Burundi (fig.3) Iñgoma refers to both the ensemble and the drum itself, which is played to accompany the girls' dance imbyino.

Chordophones are the most common instruments. The large inanga (trough zither; fig.4) is the most important; it is tuned pentatonically, the single string being laced seven or eight times to and fro along the length of the trough-shaped body. It is placed at court either solo or to accompany pastoral, humorous or moralizing songs or epic and historical songs sung in praise of the mwami. Yuki III Mazimpaka, who ruled Rwanda in the first half of the 18th century, was considered a remarkable poet-composer of inanga songs depicting the rise of the Tutsi kingdom and his own heroic deeds. Most of the inanga songs have been transmitted orally, with little variation, from generation to generation and are thus an important source of information for the early history of the Rwandan kingdom. The inanga was formerly played mainly by professional musicians but has subsequently become free to be played by anyone; as a result the traditional themes of the inanga songs have been supplanted by accounts of everyday events and contemporary political personalities. Burundese musicians developed a style described as 'whispered' singing.

The iningiti (a single-string fiddle derived from Uganda; fig.5) is used to accompany songs about persons and events in a less elevated and more improvisatory style than the inanga. The singer generally sings falsetto. The large umuduli or umunahi (musical bow) is played by the Hutu, and like the iningiti accompanies songs commenting on everyday events. It is played in the same way as in Uganda: while playing the string the musician beats a basic rhythm on the gourd resonator with a rattle.

2. Iñgoma ensemble of double-headed drums, Rwanda

The ikembe is a lamellophone which spread from the Democratic Republic of the Congo to Rwanda through Burundi; it has 11 to 13 metal keys and is played with both thumbs. Various types of rattle exist, such as the ikinyuguri gourd rattles, used for the cult of Lyangombe, the chief spirit; the amayugi bells attached to the necks of dogs while hunting; and the inzogera ankle rattles (fig.6), worn by the intore and imbyino dancers (see §3 below) to stress the rhythm.

The three main instrumental groups are the iñgoma, amakondera and insengo. In Rwanda, the iñgoma ensemble (fig.2) consists of seven to nine large drums: the ishakwe or ishaako is the is the smallest and plays a continuous basic rhythm in high pitch; three or four medium-pitched inyahura are played, one by the master-drummer; and there are three or four low-pitched ibihumurizo. Both inyahura and ibihumurizo are played in a uniform ostinato rhythm. All drums are beaten with umulishyo (drumsticks). Although ensembles of this type originated at the court of the mwami, they occur in various regions where they perform on festive occasions. Their repertory consists of up to 30 pieces, each with its own rhythmic organization. The main rhythms are the igihubi (important in ritual centring on the mwami) and the ikimanuka, in which the leader of the group plays all the drums himself. Ex.1 shows some of the patterns of the rhythm umunyuramatwe.

The iñgoma drum ensemble (fig.3) is regarded by the inhabitants of Burundi as one of the most representative elements of the musical tradition of the country. A semicircle of between 20 and 24 tall footed drums are arranged around a central drum, the inkiranya. The amashakwe, which play in uniform basic rhythm are on one side, the ibishizo on the other. All have single pegged heads and are stick beaten, one person to each drum. Players move in turn to the central drum inkiranya, dancing while playing and singing praises to the persons in whose honour they are performing, while the others beat out a steady but subtle rhythmic accompaniment.

The amakondera ensemble (see fig.1) of Twa musicians consists of six to eight bamboo trumpets, an ingaraba drum and a ruharage drum. Each trumpet has its own melodic ostinato pattern; these are combined in performance. The most usual names for the trumpets are inkanka, urugunda, insengo and inshuragane. This ensemble accompanies the intore dancers.

The insengo ensemble, consisting of five or six cylindrical flutes made of wood wrapped with skin from a bull's throat, had ritual significance for the Tutsi dynasties and occurs only in northern Rwanda. The individual names of the flutes partly correspond to the iñgoma drum names, for example ishakwe, igihumulizo and indahura. At court, only members of the Abasindi clan were allowed to play them.

Women do not play these string or wind instruments but do have a quasi-instrumental genre called ubuhuha ('to blow') for which they cup their hands together, forming resonators to amplify and modify pitches produced by lip vibration (as when blowing a trumpet).

3. VOCAL GENRES. Solo, group and choral singing are all heard in Rwanda, performed by both men and women. The ibihozo (lullaby), sung by women or young girls, is a solo genre. Antiphonal songs, in which the two singers have equal parts, include the different types of cattle song (amahamba, kubangulira, gushora, imyoma, etc.); in the ibisigo (sung dynastic poetry) various soloists alternate although exceptionally the parts may overlap. In another important type of solo performance the singer accompanies himself on an instrument such as the inanga, iningiti or umuduli. Eloquence is an envied quality expressed in singing, hence the considerable amount of parlando and recitative in the songs.

Responsorial solo and choral songs form the most important stylistic group and have many functions: the imbyino, ikinimba and ibyishongoro songs accompany dancing; others are related to the spirit cults or are performed during the amahigi (hunting ritual); amasare are sung to keep time when rowing and kwidoga during agricultural work in the fields; the indilimbo and ibitaramo songs are sung at night for male entertainment. The accompanying instrument, if any, is generally the ikinyuguri in the Lyangombe cult, or an iñgoma drum in the imbyino dance; nearly all songs can also be accompanied by rhythmic hand-clapping.

The Twa vocal style is distinct from that of the neighbouring Hutus and Tutsis: it is based entirely on the yodel technique, with an individual polyphonic structure. This yodel style is also characteristic of other Twa peoples of central Africa, which indicates that the Twa have retained their own traditional music styles despite their contact with Bantu and other peoples.

4. Inanga (trough zither)

5. Iningiti (single-string fiddle)

4. DANCE. Dancing is always collective; there is no solo dancing. Men and women have their own dances and dance together only during the Lyangombe cult ceremonies. Dancing tends to be more expressive than that of other parts of central Africa; both men's and women's dances involve violent movements of the arms and the upper part of the body, with high leaps and stamping of feet.

The best-trained and organized dancers from Rwanda are the intore. They originated at the court of the mwami, where children of noblemen, as future leaders, were taught the arts of eloquence and fighting, as well as local traditions and dances. The intore dancers are now merely picturesque additions to celebrations.

The inkaranka, ikinimba and ikinyemera are war dances found chiefly in northern Rwanda. The imbyino and ururengo are typical women's and girls' dances, intended for entertainment. The imbyino is performed throughout the country at every celebration by groups of six to eight young girls, accompanied by a chorus with two soloists and an ruharage drum; its modernized musical style shows traces of Western influence. Traditional imbyino dance and song is performed by older women; it has a graceful style, a rich polyphonic structure and a flowing melodic line.

Although these dances are performed mainly by Hutus and Tutsis, the Twa are generally considered the best dancers. While most other dancers perform in a state of frenzy, the Twa perform the same dances in a more supple and graceful style. In certain rhythms of the intore there are traces of a similarly gentle style, probably due to the frequent participation of Twa performers.

5. MUSICAL CHARACTERISTICS. As in the other former kingdoms of this interlacustrine area, the music is basically pentatonic. Hutu music clearly shows Bantu elements found in most areas of central Africa. Their melodies are built mainly on anhemitonic pentatonic scales, sometimes extended to hexa- and heptatonic; the use of the 3rd within a curved melodic line is particularly characteristic

6. Inzogera (ankle rattles) worn by intore dancers

(ex.2). Songs are primarily monophonic and responsorial with sporadic overlapping of solo and chorus and occasional use of drone and ostinato.

Ex.2 Melodic structure of a Hutu song (Günther, 1964)

Tutsi music reveals Arab influences, chiefly in the use of melisma, ornamentation and microtonal variations, in diatonic as well as chromatic scales; parlando style and repeated notes are prevalent. In their group songs heterophonic structures are common; a general descending contour characterizes inanga music.

Twa music contrasts sharply with Hutu and Tutsi music in that it is characterized by melodic yodels and movement in parallel 4ths and 5ths, suggesting connections with 'pigmy' music.

From 1973–88 J. Gansemans undertook an ethnomusicological investigation of Rwanda, commissioned by the Royal Museum for Central Africa, Tervuren (Belgium), and by the National Institute for Scientific Research, Butare (Rwanda), which collects and analyses cultural and anthropological data.

6. DEVELOPMENTS DURING THE 1990S. In massacres in Burundi in 1993, it is estimated that up to a third of the Tutsi population were killed and in 1994 in Rwanda that more than one million Rwandans died through genocide and the civil war. During the early 1990s urban bands in Rwanda, such as Impala, Les Fellows, Bisa (a university band) and Ingenzi, played music based on Congolese rumba, reggae and rock. This kind of music suffered particularly after the events of 1994. Within Rwanda, it became unfeasible for musicians to earn a living: only one band, Ingeli, tried to reform but were unsuccessful. More than two million Rwandans were forced to flee to neighbouring countries and many musicians live in exile, particularly in Brussels. Most notable of these include, from Rwanda, the singer Cécile Kayirebwa and Jean Mutsari, who plays bass, guitar and mouth organ and has set up the band Kirochi Sound; and from Burundi, Khadja Nin, who made a series of CDs in international fusion style during the 1990s.

Traditional music seems to have been less affected by the war and some musicians have made it onto the world music scene. The Hutu Master Drummers of Burundi, for example, who traditionally played only for the Tutsi ruler or mwami, toured Britain in 1999 (see fig.3 above).

PETER COOKE/J. GANSEMANS

Rwtha, Didrik Persson. See THEODORICUS PETRI NYLANDENSIS.

Ryabinin. Russian family of epic bards. The repertory of the Ryabinins was included in numerous textbooks, readers and popular publications, and the epic tradition of Russian Zaonezh'ye thus became known throughout Russia. Since 1991, international conferences entitled Ryabininskiye chteniya ['Ryabinin's Reading'] on Russian culture and epic genres have been organized once every four years in Petrozavodsk, and in 1995 the Ryabinin medal to be awarded for outstanding research into the cultural heritage of northern Russia was introduced.

(1) Trofim Grigoryevich Ryabinin (b Zaonezh'ye, near Lake Onega, 15/27 April 1801; d Zaonezh'ye, 14/26 Feb 1885). He belonged to the dynasty of epic singers of northern Russia which lasted from the end of the 19th century to the beginning of the 20th; the roots of which may be traced to the 18th century. His repertory included 26 epic themes – more than 6000 lines of starina ('old song') or bïlinï ('as it was') when they became known as epic songs in Russian 'folklore'.

The discovery of T.G. Ryabinin and the Russian epic tradition associated with him is attributed to P.N. Rïbnikov (1831–85), who recorded 23 bïlinï from him in 1860. Ten years later, on the advice of Rïbnikov, the Slavic specialist A.F. Hilferding (1831–72) went to Zaonezh'ye and recorded 21 bïlinï from T.G. Ryabinin. Rïbnikov and Hilferding noted all the basic bïlina motifs found in the classic Russian epics widely used in readers and anthologies. In the winter of 1871 Hilferding invited T.G. Ryabinin to St Petersburg, where his epic was recorded by the composer Modest Musorgsky. In 1872 T.G. Ryabinin was awarded the government medal 'For Usefulness'.

James Bailey (Bailey and Ivanova, 1998) examines the relationship between T.G. Ryabinin's melodies and the trochaic and accentual poetic meters which he used. He suggests that the music of the trochaic bïlina Dobrïnya i Vasiliy Kazimorov may have been sung with all the songs in trochaic verse and the melody of Vol'ga i Mikula may have been used with the three songs Vol'ga i Mikula, Dunay and Khoten in accentual verse. T.G. Ryabinin's descendants gradually simplified the complex melody and 'tirade form' of Vol'ga i Mikula, ultimately limiting it to a single text.

(2) Ivan Trofimovich Ryabinin (b Zaonezh'ye, near Lake Onega, 1844; d Zaonezh'ye, 1908). Son of (1) Trofim Grigoryevich Ryabinin. He adopted the 15 principal bïlinï of his father's repertory. He performed bïlinï in St Petersburg (1894), Moscow (where he was awarded a medal for being 'Best Narrator of his Time'), Kiev, Odessa, Sofia, Belgrade, Vienna, Prague and Warsaw. In Moscow his melodies were recorded on phonograph by Y.I. Blok and in notation by the composer Anton Stepanovich Arensky, who subsequently based his Fantasy on Themes of Ryabinin for piano with orchestra on two of I.T. Ryabinin's themes.

(3) Petr Ivanovich Ryabinin-Andreev (b Zaonezh'ye, near Lake Onega, 1905; d Petrozavodsk, 1953). Son of Ivan Gerasimovich Ryabinin-Andreyev (1874–1926), who was a stepson of (2) Ivan Trofimovich Ryabinin. He spent the second half of his life in Petrozavodsk. Most of his repertory of seven bïlinï was adopted from his father and one bïlina, Vol'ga i Mikula, from his grandfather. The reports produced by researchers from Moscow in 1926 indicated that P.I. Ryabinin-Andreyev's bïlinï were of high quality.

IZALY ZEMTSOVSKY

Ryabov, Vladimir Vladimirovich (b Chelyabinsk, 15 Sept 1950). Russian composer and pianist. He graduated from the Gnesin Institute in Moscow where he studied with Khachaturian (1977) and then from the Leningrad Conservatory (1979) where he was a post-graduate student of Arapov. He then taught orchestration at that institution before being appointed senior lecturer of orchestration and composition at the Ural' State Conservatory (1980–81). From 1991 he has been a repertory consultant for the Moscow SO, and since 1993 editor-in-chief for the publishers Köneman Music, Budapest. He was the winner of the Prokofiev competition (1991) and became an Honoured Representative of the Arts of Russia in 1995; he is the organizer of the Klavierabend Kompozitora festival.

Ryabov's music combines a neo-romantic style – characterized by emotional richness, a wide range of musical imagery and freedom in formal matters – with philosophical profundity and ethical rigour. Folklore, religious music and classical trends are all interwoven into what the composer calls 'a single style of a broad spectrum'; although reference points can be found in the works of Beethoven, Brahms, Medtner, Rachmaninoff and Tchaikovsky, Ryabov makes individual use of diatonic, chromatic, aleatory and avant-garde techniques. Performers associated with his music include Lazar' Berman and Gennady Rozhdestvensky.

ALLA VLADIMIROVNA GRIGOR'YEVA

Ryazanov, Pyotr Borisovich (b Narva, 9/21 Oct 1899; d Tbilisi, 11 Oct 1942). Russian composer, teacher and musicologist. His family was associated with the artistic world: his mother was a musician while his father had received music lessons from Nikolay Sokolov and advice on painting from Il'ya Repin. Ryazanov served in the Civil War before entering the Petrograd Conservatory where he studied composition with Sokolov and Aleksandr Zhitomirsky, orchestration with Steinberg and fugue with Leonid Nikolayev. He started teaching at the conservatory in 1925 and the rest of his life was mostly devoted to the training of composers in the full range of Leningrad's institutions. Of particular importance was his work in the Central (Fourth) Music College, of which Ryazanov was one of the organizers in 1926 (the staff of this institution represented the conservatory's finest forces), and his restructuring of the teaching system in the conservatory itself. An expert in all aspects of theory, he taught in all fields and developed a special course on melody which had a beneficial effect on the training of composers. Folk music was a particular concern of his: he gave a special course on the subject (1928–31) and was later appointed director of the Study Room of Folk Art of the Russian Institute for Fine Arts and History (1941–2). He also acted as a consultant for conservatories in Baku and Tbilisi in the 1930s and 40s. Evacuated out of Leningrad during the blockade, he lived in Tashkent for a while before going to Tbilisi, where he died of typhoid fever. His creative work bears the distinct imprint of his unflagging interest in folklore: the Saratovskiye chastushki ('Saratov Chastushki') are arrangements of material he gathered in the Volga region in the period 1914–20, while two folksongs are used as prototypes for the thematic material in the second and third movements of his String Quartet. While his work can be characterized by intellectualism and emotional restraint, lyrical expression was closest to his heart. His pupils include Andria Balanchivadze, Bogoslovsky, Dzerzhinsky, Machavariani, Mayzel', Novikov, Solov'yov-Sedoy, Sviridov and Yevlakhov.

Ryba [Poisson, Peace, Ryballandini, Rybaville], Jakub (Šimon) Jan (b Přeštice, nr Klatovy, 26 Oct 1765; d Rožmitál pod Třemšinem, 8 April 1815). Czech teacher, composer, choirmaster and writer on music. He was the son of Jakub Ryba (1732–92), a cantor (schoolmaster) and organist who worked at Rožmitál, Přeštice and Nepomuk, and probably also a composer. After studying singing, thoroughbass, the piano, organ and violin with his father at Nepomuk, he attended the Piarist Gymnasium in Prague (1781–4), where he continued to teach himself (the cello, organ and theory) and began to compose. He returned to Nepomuk to assist his ailing father, and from 1786 worked as an assistant teacher at Mníšek. On 11 February 1788 he was appointed assistant teacher and on 23 May 1788 cantor and church choirmaster at Rožmitál. He was a dedicated promoter of Enlightened education policies promulgated by Imperial legates such as Ferdinand Kindermann, but the struggle may have proved too much for he committed suicide in 1815.

Artistically, Ryba was one of the most prominent 18th-century Czech cantors; though he devoted himself assiduously to his teaching duties (see his school diaries), he wrote a large number of compositions (at first under various pseudonyms), of which the sacred ones survive far more completely than the secular. They develop the church idiom of J.L. Oehlschlägel, F.X. Brixi and J.B. Vaňhal. Most of his compositions require modest forces, though some, such as the Christmas masses, call for woodwind in addition to the usual strings, trumpets, timpani and organ. His Solemn Mass in E♭ (Němeček's catalogue no.378) circulated under the name of Joseph Haydn, and is one of several Ryba masses to remain in the repertory of Bohemian church choirs today; the Christmas Mass of 1796, Hej, mistře, technically not a mass but a quasi-narrative series of pastorellas with Czech texts, remains his best-known work. The numerous Czech pastorellas are undoubtedly the most vivid part of his output, a judgment corroborated by the large number of late 18th- and 19th-century manuscript copies extant throughout Czech-speaking areas (see Berkovec, 1987); they display a highly individual amalgamation of Czech folksong elements and a simplified Classical texture. He was one of the earliest composers to introduce Czech into solo art song.

In his theoretical treatise Ryba attempted to establish Czech musical terminology; though his terms were not accepted into common use, the treatise is notable as the second of its kind printed in Czech (after Jan Blahoslav's Musica, 1558). He also wrote hymn texts, didactic poetry and prose, occasional and gratulatory poems, and translated Latin and Greek works into Czech.

MILAN POŠTOLKA/MARK GERMER

Rybář, Jaroslav (b České Budějovice, 8 April 1942). Czech composer. From 1963 to 1968 he studied composition with Dobiáš and music theory with Janeček at the Prague Academy of Musical Arts. He then taught theory at the Deyl Conservatory in Prague. After a career as a producer with the recording company Supraphon (1977–98) he became lecturer in sound production at the Prague Academy of Musical Arts and a freelance producer. A laureate of the UNESCO International Rostrum of Composers (1974), he received the prize of the Czech Music Fund in 1991 and the Czech Music Critics' Award in 1996.

After the Sonata for 12 wind instruments (1969), the piece which marks the end of his neo-classical phase, Rybář turned to dodecaphony; his first work to use this technique was Pět pro dva ('Five for Two', 1971). In the course of creating a personal style, he has since emphasized continuous development of motivic cells within a free 12-note method. His music's expression is lyrical and reflective, in response to his relentless search for answers to existential questions, while the later works emphasize melodic lines; passages that are consolatory in nature contain consonant harmonies.

JAN DEHNER

Rybarič, Richard (b Bratislava, 19 Feb 1930). Slovak musicologist. He studied the piano and music theory, and musicology with Kresánek and Hudec at Bratislava University (1948–53), taking the doctorate there in 1953 with a dissertation on Slovak neumes and nota choralis in the time of church feudalism. Subsequently he was a research assistant at the Slovak Academy of Sciences, Bratislava, and from 1973 a research fellow and head of the music history department of its Arts History Institute, while also working as a part-time lecturer in notation and Slovak music history at Bratislava University (from 1958). His chief area of research is Slovak music history, particularly medieval, Renaissance and Baroque; he has written several studies of individual composers of those periods (Schimbraczky, Capricornus), and on song collections of the 17th and 18th centuries. His other main interest is musical palaeography, and he is on the editorial board of Musicologica slovaca.

Rycardt. See RUCKERS family.

Rychlík, Jan (b Prague, 27 April 1916; d Prague, 20 Jan 1964). Czech composer and writer on music. After studies at the Prague School of Commerce he was a composition pupil of Řídký at the conservatory (1939–45) and in masterclasses (1945–6). At this time he composed light pieces and swing dance music and also gave music lessons. Throughout his life he was greatly concerned with film music, a field in which he made technical experiments later exploited in concert works. His spontaneous musical gifts were balanced by an unusually broad knowledge of music history and theory, folk music, mathematics and the natural sciences; this wide scope was reflected in his compositions, always inventive and economical. He took an analytic and critical attitude to other music, using any influence in an original way; his approach to post-war developments, with which he came into contact in the late 1950s and early 60s, was characteristic: Rychlík's later works are among the most significant Czech results from this encounter. He was one of the earliest jazz scholars and also made a study of the organ; his essays on instrumentation are particularly valuable.

Rycroft, David K(enneth) (b Durban, 7 Dec 1924; d London, 8 Aug 1997). South African ethnomusicologist. He studied Bantu languages and phonetics at Witwatersrand University, Johannesburg (1942–6), after which he became cultural recreation officer in the former Johannesburg Non-European Affairs Department. He promoted black cultural activities, including adult education in music and joined Hugh Tracey's African Music Society and the Bantu Music Festival Committee. In 1952 he emigrated to England, where he became a lecturer in Bantu languages and African music at the School of Oriental and African studies, London. His research focussed on the music, language and literature of the Swazi and Zulu peoples. He was one of the first scholars to become interested in urban music in Africa, about which he wrote some ground-breaking analyses that have become essential reading for all students of African music. As a composer, his most prominent work was the national anthem of Swaziland, which was adopted in 1968. Other compositions include a Trio for oboe, clarinet and bassoon (1957), Elegy and Fanfare on a Swahili theme for organ (1972), Fanfare for three natural trumpets with kettledrums (1973) and Prelude, Canon and Fugue on a Zulu folksong, for four-part male choir (1977). Rycroft was also co-founder of the Guild of Gentlemen Trumpeters and the New Melstock Band, in which he played period instruments. After his retirement from SOAS in 1987 he became the editor of the Galpin Society Journal.

DAVID COPLAN

Rydl, Kurt (b Vienna, 8 Oct 1947). Austrian bass. He studied zoology before training at the Hochschule für Musik in Vienna and the Moscow Academy. His stage career began at Linz in 1972. He made his Vienna Staatsoper début in 1976 as Rocco, and sang the same role for his débuts at La Scala, Milan, in 1990 and Covent Garden in 1993. His voluminous black bass is especially suited to malignant characters such as Caspar (Der Freischütz), Hagen and Hunding, but he has proved equally successful as Ochs and Kecal (The Bartered Bride), and his ability to combine menace and humour makes him a striking Osmin, a role he sang at the Salzburg Festival in 1987–9. Throughout his career Rydl has maintained strong links with the Vienna Staatsoper where his repertory includes the Verdi bass roles. He is also an experienced concert singer. Notable among his many recordings are Sarastro, Rocco, Caspar, Fafner and Daland.

ANDREW CLARK

Rydman, Kari (b Helsinki, 15 Oct 1936). Finnish teacher and composer. He became known as an avant-gardist, writer and cultural polemicist through his 'nursery concerts' in 1963 (so called after these experimental events were described by a critic as 'nursery noise'). He taught music at Helsinki Comprehensive School (1958–76) and at Valkeakoski Music College and Workers' Institute (from 1977). He has also worked as a music critic and has made numerous programmes for radio and television.

Self-taught as a composer, Rydman adopted a pluralist approach from an early age. His work displays influences ranging from the Baroque to the Polish avant-garde (Sérénade à Djamila Boupacha), and folk music (Rondeaux des nuits blanches d'été) to pop. Between 1962 and 1964 he experimented widely, as is shown in the avant-garde techniques of the six sonatas and three string quartets of that time. The last of the one-movement quartets (nos. 2–4, which together form a 'grand quartet') introduces quotations and allusions; Syrinx (1964) displayed the first signs of his Impressionism while his light music is found in the Symphony of Modern Worlds (1968), and DNA (1970). In the 1960s Rydman began writing film music, songs and choral works, which pointed the way to the triadic harmony of his works of the late 1970s. Rydman became best known in that decade as the writer and performer of sentimental, touching songs. More recent chamber works, such as the Viola Sonata (one in a series of sonatas for various instruments), can be described as neo-tonal, and two of the movements in the Inventions for string orchestra (1982) are headed 'nostalgias'.

MIKKO HEINIÖ

Ryelandt, Joseph (b Bruges, 7 April 1870; d Bruges, 29 June 1965). Belgian composer. As a child he studied music privately, but at the Katholieke Universiteit of Leuven he studied law. In 1891 he discontinued these studies and became for four years the only private composition pupil of Tinel. He was director of the Bruges Conservatory, 1924–45 (with a break of two years during World War II) and taught counterpoint at the Ghent Conservatory (1929–39). His most creative period as a composer lasted from 1892 to 1944. In the last 20 years of his life his main interest was literature, especially the translation of poetry.

Although Ryelandt lived most of his productive life in the 20th century, he was a belated Romanticist. The only sign of modernism in his works is a tendency towards Impressionism. He was critical of Tinel's uncompromising Classicism and enthusiasm for Brahms, leaning more towards Franck and, for a brief period, Fauré. His varied musical production includes symphonic music, piano music, organ music, chamber music, songs, choral works and the opera Sainte Cécile. The core of his output consists of religious music, especially large oratorios in the tradition of Liszt, Franck and Elgar, with whose Dream of Gerontius he became acquainted in Bruges, an outpost of English Roman Catholics. Although Ryelandt's religious works brought him international recognition, they are now considered no more than respectable. The instrumental works, on the other hand, attracted increased interest during the 1990s and reveal his refinement. He also composed some 60 outstanding songs using French, Latin, Spanish and Dutch texts. His songs on texts by Guido Gezelle became well known internationally.

On Tinel's recommendation some of his early works were published by Breitkopf & Härtel, but most of his works remain unpublished and unknown. His lack of ambition and devout Roman Catholic faith are suggested in his unpublished diary, Notices sur mes oeuvres: 'If God wants my work to be recognized one day, it will be. If not, what does it matter? The artist's task is to create, that's all'.

DIANA VON VOLBORTH-DANYS

Rypdal, Terje (b Oslo, 23 Aug 1947). Norwegian jazz and rock electric guitarist and composer. He studied classical piano and taught himself to play the guitar. At Oslo University he studied composition with Finn Mortensen and the Lydian chromatic concept of tonal organization with its originator, George Russell, in whose sextet and big band he also played. He worked with Jan Garbarek from the late 1960s and first achieved recognition outside Norway at the New Jazz Meeting, Baden-Baden (1969), at which he also presented some of his own compositions. In 1972 he formed the group Odyssey, with which he visited London and the USA, recorded, and performed (with Palle Mikkelborg as a guest soloist) at the Bergen Festival in 1978. The following year he recorded the album Descendre (ECM) with Mikkelborg and the drummer Jon Christensen. From 1984 he led a trio.

Rypdal's style incorporates elements of rock and modern concert music, and such novel sonorities as note clusters produced by playing the electric guitar with a violin bow, as can be heard on his recording as unaccompanied soloist After the Rain (1976, ECM). His works, which owe something to the music of Krzysztof Penderecki, include Eternal Circulation for symphony orchestra and jazz ensemble (1972), Somehow it's Making me Smile Inside for guitar (1975), Imagi for dancers and big band (1984) and orchestral and chamber music.

RANDI HULTIN

Rysanek, Leonie (b Vienna, 14 Nov 1926; d Vienna, 7 March 1998). Austrian soprano. She studied at the Vienna Music Academy with Alfred Jerger and later with Rudolf Grossmann. She made her début at Innsbruck in 1949 as Agathe (Der Freischütz) and then sang at Saarbrücken, where her roles included Arabella, Donna Anna, Senta, Sieglinde and Leonora (La forza del destino). At the first postwar Bayreuth Festival in 1951 her Sieglinde created a sensation, and the following year she joined the Staatsoper in Munich. Her opulent voice, with its thrilling upper register, and her dramatic temperament were heard and seen to advantage in the title roles of Die Liebe der Danae, Die ägyptische Helena and Salome, as the Empress in Die Frau ohne Schatten and Chrysothemis, and as Lady Macbeth, Turandot, Tosca, Santuzza and Medea.

Rysanek was first heard in London as Danae in the British première of Strauss's opera during the Munich company's season at Covent Garden in 1953; later she appeared there as Chrysothemis, Sieglinde, Tosca and Elsa. She made her American début in 1956 at San Francisco, where she sang Senta and Sieglinde. She returned to Bayreuth as Elsa (1958), Elisabeth (1964) and Kundry (1982). In 1959 she made her début at the Metropolitan, replacing Callas as Lady Macbeth. She then appeared there regularly in the Italian and the German repertories, sharing most of her time between New York and the Vienna Staatsoper, with guest appearances in other leading European houses. In 1986 she celebrated the 30th anniversary of her American début by singing the Kostelnička at San Francisco, and also sang Ortrud at the Metropolitan. Her later roles included Kabanicha, Herodias (Salome) and Clytemnestra, which she sang at the Salzburg Festival in 1996, her final stage appearance. She recorded many of her main roles, most notably Sieglinde (under both Furtwängler and Böhm), Lady Macbeth, the Empress and Electra.

She first appeared at the Wielki Theatre in 1837, and until 1852 she took leading parts in operas by Meyerbeer, Rossini, Mozart and Verdi. Later she moved to Lwów and founded a school of singing. BARBARA CHMARA-ŻACZKIEWICZ

Rzepko, Władysław (b Piórków, nr Sandomierz, 21 April 1854; d Warsaw, 19 April 1932). Polish viola player, composer and teacher, son of ADOLF RZEPKO, and father of the cellist and composer Karol Rzepko (b Warsaw, 30 Oct 1882; d Kraków, 14 Nov 1944). After lessons from his father he studied the violin under Apolinary Kątski, theory under Karol Studziński and composition under Moniuszko at the Music Institute in Warsaw (1869–73). From 1870 to 1873 he played the violin at the Wielki Theatre and studied conducting privately with Castagnieri. From 1875 he studied further with Emil Stiller (viola), Jan Quattrini (singing), and from 1881 composition with Zygmunt Noskowski. At this time he also played the viola in the string quartet of the Warsaw Music Society and taught the violin, piano and organ. From 1885 he taught choral singing and music theory in the music school of the Warsaw Music Society, as well as music in secondary schools and teacher-training colleges. He was co-founder, and from 1887 until his death deputy director, of the Lutnia singing society. He published articles on music in a number of journals, including Echo muzyczne, teatralne i artystyczne and Nowości muzyczne, and wrote several teaching works: Szkoła na melodykon lub fisharmonię ('A reed organ or melodicon tutor', Warsaw, 1893), Zasady nauki śpiewu oparte na podstawie fizjologii ('The principles of learning to sing on the basis of physiology', Warsaw, 1903) and Podręcznik gry skrzypcowej ('A violin manual', Warsaw, 1910–12). He compiled songbooks and arranged and transcribed Polish and foreign music. He also undertook editorial work for the Warsaw Music Society, publishing numerous works by Moniuszko, including his last Śpiewniki domowe ('Songbooks for home use').

BARBARA CHMARA-ŻACZKIEWICZ

Rzewski, Frederic (Anthony) (b Westfield, MA, 13 April 1938). American composer and pianist. He studied with Randall Thompson (counterpoint) and Walter Piston (orchestration) at Harvard University (BA 1958) and with Roger Sessions and Milton Babbitt at Princeton University (MFA 1960), where he also attended courses in philosophy and Greek. In 1960–61 he studied with Dallapiccola in Florence on a Fulbright scholarship. Throughout most of the 1960s he was active as a pianist and teacher in Europe; he took part in the first performances of Stockhausen's Klavierstück X (1962) and Plus Minus (1964), and taught at the Kölner Kurse für Neue Musik (1963, 1964 and 1970). He has received grants from the Ford Foundation for study with Elliott Carter in Berlin (1963–5) and from the Fromm Foundation (1969). In 1966 in Rome he co-founded with Alvin Curran and Richard Teitelbaum the live electronic ensemble Musica Elettronica Viva (MEV). He returned to New York in 1971 but from 1976 he has divided his time between Rome and Liège, where he became professor of composition at the Conservatoire Royal in 1977; in 1984 he was visiting professor of composition at Yale University. He has also taught at the universities of Cincinnati, SUNY, Buffalo, California (San Diego), the Royal Conservatory of The Hague and the Berlin Hochschule der Künste. Among his commissions are those from the Merce Cunningham Dance Company (1974, for What is Freedom?) and the NEA (1977, for Song and Dance; 1979, for A Long Time Man).

With MEV, on which he had a strong influence, Rzewski explored collective improvisation (in Work Songs); this led to the socialist-political concerns expressed in such works as Coming Together and Attica, composed in 1972 to the text of a letter from an inmate of Attica (New York) State Prison, and to works combining elements from both written and improvised music (Les moutons de Panurge). He went on to explore folk and popular melodies in settings that are sometimes unambiguously tonal and often display exceptional virtuosity. One favoured scheme is that of a short theme followed by a large number of short variations, including climaxes of dramatic force (e.g. in The People United will never be Defeated, A Long Time Man and, especially, Antigone-legend). Several works of the late 1970s show a return to experimental and graphic notation (Le silence des espaces infinis, The Price of Oil). The 1980s found him dealing with 12-note techniques in novel ways (Antigone-legend, The Persians). More spontaneous approaches appear in later compositions (Whangdoodles, Sonata). Unusually large-scale works include the oratorio The Triumph of Death and The Road, a 5-hour 'novel' for solo piano. All of his works have a characteristic drive and intensity. He has participated as pianist and conductor in some of the recordings of his compositions, and as pianist in recordings of works by Boulez, Eisler and others.

S(uratno), Nano (b Garut, Java, 4 April 1944). Indonesian composer. In the early 1960s he worked as a high school music teacher and studied with the important Sundanese composer Koko Koswara. In 1972 Nano S. formed the group Gentra Madya, which in 1976 released its first cassette of original works for kacapi and gamelan saléndro. His songs, including Cinta ('Love', 1978), Anjeun ('You', 1984) and Kalangkang ('Reflection', 1986), achieved phenomenal success among popular audiences during the 1970s and 80s in conjunction with a very active Sundanese cassette industry. His non-commercial commissions include Spirit of Bandung for the 50th anniversary of the Asia-Africa Conference in Bandung (1995) and Hiroshima for the government of Hiroshima (1999). He has also written operetta (gending karesmen), songs for children, poetry and fiction. Nano S. has helped to promote Sundanese music through international concert tours, teaching in the USA and Japan, and intercultural music collaborations. He has established an international reputation as a composer of Sundanese popular music (pop Sunda). Songs in this hybrid genre combine stylistic elements of karawitan (Sundanese traditional music), which include Sundanese language texts, melodies, formal structures and instrumentation (gamelan), with elements of musik (non-Indonesian popular music), including Western harmony and instrumentation (keyboard, bass and drums), country and western vocal style and Latin-American rhythms.

Saad, Siti Bint [Siti binti] (b Kisauni, Zanzibar, 1950). Zanzibari taarab singer. She performed in Zanzibar during the 1920s and 30s and was the first East African singer to be recorded on 78 r.p.m. gramophone discs. Along with her band she travelled to Bombay to record over 250 songs between 1928 and 1930 for Odeon, Columbia and the Gramophone Company, then the African branch of His Master's Voice. Siti's songs were, according to the Swahili poet Shaaban Robert, 'the pride of East Africa', and her image and voice are today still retained as symbolic of Zanzibar's past.

GREGORY F. BARZ

Saar, Mart (b Hüpassaare, Vastsemõisa, 16 Sept 1882; d Tallinn, 28 Oct 1963). Estonian composer. He studied at the St Petersburg Conservatory (1901–11), where his teachers included Nikolay Rimsky-Korsakov and Anatoly Lyadov. He went on to teach in Tartu and at the Tallinn Conservatory (1943–56). A prolific composer and one of the founders of an Estonian national style, Saar primarily wrote choral works, solo songs and piano pieces. Some of his first compositions, such as the song Must lind ('Black Bird', 1909) and Skizze (1910) for piano, with their chromatic decentralization of tonality, became early examples of new music in Estonia. None of his Estonian contemporaries could rival his subtle sense of harmonic colouring, an element especially obvious in the solo songs. In his choral works, such as Põhjavaim ('The Guardian Spirit of Our Northern Land', 1910, in 14 segakoorilaulu, 1914), Leelo ('Chant', 1919) and Luule, see ei tule tuulest ('Verses do not Fly in Winds', 1934, in Segakoorid, vol. iv, 1935), he increasingly adopted elements of Estonian folk music, a characteristic that has contributed to their popularity with the general public.

MART HUMAL

Saariaho, Kaija (Anneli) (b Helsinki, 14 Oct 1952). Finnish composer. After attending the Helsinki University of Art and Design, she studied at the Sibelius Academy, where her teachers included Paavo Heininen (1976–81), and at the Freiburg Musikhochschule (1981–2) with Brian Ferneyhough, Klaus Huber and others. In 1982 she moved to Paris where she has worked regularly at IRCAM. She has also worked in San Diego (1988–9) and served as visiting professor of composition at the Sibelius Academy (1997–8).

Saariaho's early output from the late 1970s includes many melodious vocal works. With Im Traume for cello and piano (1980), however, her focus shifted from melody to tone-colour, which with harmony became a central element in her music; melodies and distinct rhythmic patterns rarely appear. Characteristics of her works from the 1980s include tonal surfaces worked out in rich detail; sensitive, descriptive lyrical writing; and slow transformations. Her search for new timbres has stimulated a wide-ranging study of new instrumental techniques.

In many of her works Saariaho has exploited the possibilities of new technology (e.g. live electronics, tape and computer-assisted composition). Vers le blanc (1982), completed in the IRCAM studio, is essentially static; over the course of 15 minutes, the work changes one three-voiced harmony into another. Verblendungen for orchestra and tape (1982–4), in which she brought live performers and electronic material together for the first time, continues to explore slow processes of change: a single drawn-out diminuendo follows an initial explosion. Lichtbogen for 9 musicians and electronics (1985–6) was the first work Saariaho wrote with the aid of a computer. The starting point for the compositional process was cello harmonics which burst into sound when bow pressure is increased. The piece's structure and harmony grew out of a computer analysis of this point of departure.

Saariaho's music of the late 1980s and 90s is more expressive and often more rapid in its fluctuations. Rhythmic elements are stronger, although regular pulses remain absent. Rich tone-colours still hold a central position. These stylistic features are reflected in, among others, Jardin secret II for harpsichord and tape (1984–6), Io for chamber ensemble, live electronics and tape (1986–7, composed for the 10th anniversary of the Pompidou Centre) and Nymphea for string quartet and electronics (1987, composed for the Kronos Quartet). The last of these employs models from nature for abstract musical composition; symmetrical shapes are in constant evolution.

Saariaho used a large orchestra for the first time in the diptych formed of two independent works from 1990: Du cristal and . . . à la fumée. In the latter, the orchestra is reinforced by amplification of a solo alto flute and solo cello. Solo amplification is also employed in Amers for cello, chamber ensemble and electronics (1992). A special microphone, developed specifically for this work, allows for the separate amplification of each cello string. The violin concerto Graal théâtre (1994), written for Gidon Kremer, continues to feature Saariaho's rich and expansive string style, but places greater emphasis on melody than earlier works and does not employ electronics. Melodic writing breaks out into expressive and broadly curving lines in Château de l'âme for soprano, women's voices and orchestra (1996), commissioned by the Salzburg Festival.

Saariaho has often found inspiration in extra-musical sources such as literature, visual and natural phenomena. She has also composed many works with a dramatic or symbolic dimension, or in which various arts cross-fertilize. One of her most finely tuned compositions is the radiophonic Stilleben (1987–8), which she has described as about travel, distances and communication when people are separated from one another, or are away from their home country. The piece uses speech, music and a variety of concrete soundscapes. The ballet Maa ('The Earth', 1991), commissioned by the Finnish National Ballet, is similarly based more on feelings and free associations than a clear plot. L'amour de loin, an opera commissioned by the Théâtre du Châtelet, Paris, and the Salzburg Festival (to be premiered at Salzburg in August 2000), takes the imagined life of Jaufré Rudel, a 12th-century troubadour as its subject. Central to the story is Jaufré's relationship with the Countess of Tripoli. Lonh ('After') for soprano and electronics (1996), like Château de l'âme written for Dawn Upshaw, is a setting of Jaufré's poems in their original language.

KIMMO KORHONEN (with RISTO NIEMINEN)

Saavedra Iglesias, Pascual Gregorio (b Mondoñedo, Lugo, 5 July 1829; d 27 March 1908). Spanish composer. He studied composition with José Pacheco and music theory and the violin with his father, who was first violinist in the chapel of Mondoñedo Cathedral, as his own father had been before him. Pascal Saavedera became a permanent member of the chapel in 1857, as third violin. He had in the meantime studied to be a priest at the diocesan seminary, where he was ordained and where he was head of the philosophy department. He succeeded Pacheco as maestro de capilla in January 1867 and remained in this post until his death.

Throughout his tenure the chapel was gradually dismantled owing to diminishing cathedral finances from 1820. This situation is reflected in his works, which, while maintaining a classical aesthetic, were forced to economize on the number of soloists, choir and orchestra; he was often obliged to use instrumentalists from the town band. His output of 110 works, which survive in the cathedral archives, includes responsorios, antiphons, psalms, lamentations and various works in Latin, as well as villancicos in Spanish and Galician, hymns to the Virgin and some secular songs.

C. VILLANUEVA

Saba, Abol Hassan (b Tehran, 1902; d Tehran, 1957). Iranian violinist, composer and teacher. He was a competent performer on many instruments including the setār, the santur, the kamāncheh and the tombak, but in later life was identified above all as the foremost violinist of his time. He began his musical training when only six years old. His earliest teacher was Mirza Abdollah, who is credited with the definitive organization of the *dastgāh*s of Persian classical music.

In 1924 Saba enrolled in Ali Naqi Vaziri's newly established music school, where he learnt about the theory of Western music and was attracted to Vaziri's ideas for a reform of Persian music on European lines. In 1927 Vaziri founded a branch of his music school in Rasht in the Gilan Province and installed Saba as its principal. During his three years in Gilān, Saba collected folksongs from that region which he submitted to Western notation; he was the first Iranian to do research on the folk music of his country.

In the 1930s Saba began to establish a reputation as a violinist and a private teacher. In his violin playing he combined the versatility of Western technique with the subtle nuances and embellishments of traditional music, making for a highly individual and effective style. He trained a large number of violinists, many of whom became performers and teachers. He also occasionally accepted pupils for other instruments; the most notable among these is the santur virtuoso Faramarz Payvar.

Beginning in 1933 and continuing throughout the 1940s, several disc recordings were made of Saba's renditions of various *dastgāh*s, and of his original compositions; they are striking representations of Persian violin style. He published several important books on the method of violin playing as well as four volumes on the method of santur performance and one book on the study of setār. These publications contain notations of selected *gusheh*s from a number of *dastgāh*s.

Sá Bacon, José Pereira de. See SANT'ANNA, JOSÉ PEREIRA DE.

Sabadini [Sabbadini, Sabatini], Bernardo (b ?Venice; d Parma, 26 Nov 1718). Italian composer and organist. He was a member of the clergy. According to the libretto of his oratorio I disegni della divina sapienza, he was a Venetian. From 1662 to 1672 he was maestro d'istrumenti and Rosenmüller's assistant at the Ospedale della Pietà, Venice. He may be the Don Bernardino Sabatini who in December 1673 was a singer at Urbino Cathedral. From 1 July 1681 he was organist at the Farnese court at Parma and on 1 March 1689 became maestro di cappella there; he was organist and 'resident' of the ducal church from February 1689 and maestro di cappella from 1692. In January 1711 he received a benefice attached to that church. As court composer he was, from 1686 to 1700, responsible for the musical preparation of operas performed at the Novissimo Teatro Ducale, Parma, and the Nuovo Teatro Ducale, Piacenza (the second capital of the state), in collaboration with the court poets: Lotto Lotti until 1687, then Aurelio Aureli until 1694 and finally Giovanni Tamagni. Ferdinando Galli-Bibiena designed the scenery, Federico Crivelli the dances and Gasparo Torelli the costumes. With this team Ranuccio II Farnese raised the court operatic spectacles to a level comparable with that of the major Italian theatre cities. The highpoint of the Farnese theatrical venture was the marriage celebration of Odoardo II Farnese in 1690, for which Sabadini, 'heroic composer of our times', wrote La gloria d'Amore and Il favore degli dei. Sabadini's operatic output is divided between apparently original operas and adaptations of works first performed elsewhere, mainly in Venice. His arias are tuneful and well constructed. He was one of several composers in the region to write virtuoso passages not only for the singer, but also for continuo instruments, particularly cello obbligato; in one case he apparently composed a new scene to accommodate a visiting virtuoso harpist. In later years Sabadini gained some productions outside the duchy, at Turin, Rome, Genoa and Pavia. Francesco II of Modena acquired 11 aria anthologies from performances in Parma and Piacenza before 1692; these contain most of Sabadini's surviving music. A Gasparo Sabadini was court organist from 1696 to 1707.

SABAM [Société Belge des Auteurs, Compositeurs et Editeurs]. See COPYRIGHT, §VI (under Belgium).

Sabaneyev, Leonid Leonidovich (b Moscow, 1 Oct 1881; d Antibes, 3 May 1968). Russian musicologist and composer. He studied mathematics and physics, and in his early twenties entered the Moscow Conservatory, where he studied the piano with Zverev and P.J. Shlotsen, and composition with Taneyev. From 1906 he devoted himself to composition and musicology. An ardent follower of contemporary trends, his writings were among the first to promote the music of Skryabin and spread Skryabin's influence among younger composers. Within a short time he became the music critic for a number of periodicals, both Russian and foreign: Golos Moskvï, Russkoye slovo, Utro Rossii, Muzïka, Apollon, Muzïkal'nïy sovremennik, Melos, Der blaue Ritter, among others. His mathematical training led him to probe the theoretical aspects of music; his early writings include an influential series of writings on harmony, rhythm, pitch, and the relationship between colour and sound. Much of his time was devoted to music-related work for the socialist cause. Sabaneyev was one of the founders and chairmen of the State Institute of Musical Science, Moscow (1921–3). From 1921 he also headed the music division of the State Academy of Artistic Sciences and was on the governing boards of numerous important teaching institutes.

Sabaneyev's views were highly respected during the first years of the new Soviet government. He became music editor of Pravda and Izvestiya, and was president of the forward-looking Association of Contemporary Music. After 1926 he lived abroad, in Germany, France, Britain and the USA. After living for many years in Villeneuve-Laubet, he settled in Nice. His historic study Modern Russian Composers (1927/R) became an English-language classic. Sabaneyev's best works were devoted to Skryabin, whom he greatly admired and under whose spell Sabaneyev wrote his own compositions, including a ballet L'aviatrice (Paris, Théâtre des Champs-Elysées, 1928), a symphonic poem Flots d'azur (1936), an oratorio The Revelation (1940), a chaconne for organ and orchestra, two piano trios (1907, 1924), a violin sonata (1924), songs and many piano pieces.

Sabata, Victor de. See DE SABATA, VICTOR.

Sabatini, Bernardo. See SABADINI, BERNARDO.

Sabatino [Sabbatini, Sabatini], Nicola (b Naples, *c*1705; d Naples, 4 April 1796). Italian composer. He was the son of Giovanni (Sebastiano) Sabatino (b Chieti, 1667; d Naples, 29 April 1742), a violinist in the Neapolitan royal chapel under Alessandro Scarlatti from 1691. Nicola attended the S Onofrio conservatory, where he studied the violin with Barbella and composition with Feo and Ignazio Prota. He then established himself as a composer of sacred and secular vocal music whose works were in demand in Naples and beyond; existing autograph manuscripts and performance dates attest to his creative activity between 1726 and 1774. In autumn 1735 he composed the second part of a lost serenata, Il tempo felice, for the wedding of Raimondo di Sangro, Prince of Sansevero, which Pergolesi was unable to complete because of ill health. In July 1742 he petitioned the King of Naples for the position as violinist in the royal chapel which his father had held until his death, but the post was given to Constantino Roberto, who had served the chapel for several years. In the 1750s Sabatino tried his hand at opera, writing Cleante for Rome and Arsace for Naples. In 1758 he succeeded G. Maraucci as maestro di cappella of S Giacomo degli Spagnoli in Naples, and in 1763 was appointed maestro at the Oratorio di S Filippo (Girolamini), where he served until he retired in 1788.

Sabatino's contemporaries considered him a worthy composer. His masses of 1726 and 1728 show him already in full command of traditional idioms. By 1749 his music was representative of pre-Classical trends: the Dixit Dominus in B♭ opens with a chorus in a kind of concerto-sonata form, with a contrasting theme in the dominant, and the 'Amen' fugue of the Mass in F ends homophonically with 24 bars of repeated cadence formulae. On Jommelli's death (25 August 1774), Sabatino was chosen from among the musicians of Naples to compose and conduct the music for the public funeral service. He was honoured by Padre Martini, who requested his portrait for his collection, now in the Bologna Conservatory; it carries the inscription 'Nicolaus Sabbatino Napolitanus in sue civitatis oratorio aliisque principibus ecclesiis musici concentus magister'.

Sabatino's brother Gioacchino (b Naples, *c*1718; d Naples, 16 June 1800) was a violinist in the royal chapel from 1756 until his death; a Tota pulchra for three voices (I-Nc) is attributed to him. Another brother, Francesco (d Naples, 6 May 1769), was also a violinist, and a priest.

Sabbadini, Bernardo. See SABADINI, BERNARDO.

Sabbatini, Galeazzo (b ?Pesaro, 1597; d Pesaro, 6 Sept 1662). Italian composer. It is not known whether he was related to P.P. Sabbatini. He studied with Vincenzo Pellegrini when the latter was a canon of Pesaro Cathedral and was himself elected to this position in 1626, remaining in it until 1630. From then until 1639 he was maestro di cappella at the court of the Duke of Mirandola, and from 1641 he was again a canon at Pesaro Cathedral. In the interim he may have lived at Bergamo, for in 1639 there was a plan to have him appointed to the vacant choirmastership at S Maria Maggiore there; this was, however, rejected by the church authorities. He visited Rome during the periods 1652–3 and 1657–9.

In his sacred music, which consists mainly of motets, Sabbatini shows a preference for small concertato textures, and his last collection is of solo pieces. Most of the Sacrae laudes of 1626 are duet and trio motets with continuo; the four- and five-part pieces are somewhat fragmentary in texture and humdrum in contrapuntal procedure. Whereas Sabbatini seems to have been uninterested in structural refrains and did not follow the fashionable trend towards triple time, his bass lines are interesting and mainly slow-moving, and his melodies vary between simple utterance and declamatory ornamentation, often flowering into a climax at the close of a piece. In his madrigals too he shows a preference for smaller textures. The last two collections include some pieces with string parts, most of them belonging to the genre of the strophic canzonet. One of these (1630) is prefaced by a sonata that is also intended as a ritornello; another (1636) is founded on a popular ground bass. The madrigals proper contain elaborate vocal lines of the kind encountered in Sabbatini's motets.

Sabbatini was also something of a theorist: he published a manual on continuo playing and was praised by Kircher for his scientific knowledge of music; this was with reference to a tuning method he had devised in which the tone was divided into five.

JEROME ROCHE

Sabbatini, Luigi Antonio (b Albano Laziale, nr Rome, ?1732; d Padua, 29 Jan 1809). Italian theorist and composer. His earliest dated work, Benedictus sit Deus for two voices and continuo (in D-MÜs), was composed in his 13th year and indicates that he had received a strong grounding in music before he became a pupil of Martini in Bologna. It is generally supposed that his studies with Martini coincided with his eight years' residence at the convent of S Francesco in Bologna. Eitner claimed that he became a Franciscan around 1759, but most other lexicographers state that he joined the order in the early 1750s. 202 letters to Martini (autographs in I-Bc) written between 2 June 1764 and 17 March 1784 reveal that by 1764 he was no longer Martini's pupil. They do not substantiate the claim that he later studied with F.A. Vallotti in Padua (further letters are in I-Baf, Bsf, Pca).

On 28 November 1767 Sabbatini became maestro di cappella at the collegiate church of S Barnaba in Marino, near his birthplace; his friendship with the Franciscan Cardinal Ganganelli, later Pope Clement XIV, may have helped him to obtain this post, as well as one at the Franciscan basilica of SS Apostoli in Rome, to which he was appointed on 20 April 1772. Late in life Vallotti is supposed to have named Sabbatini his successor as maestro di cappella at the basilica of S Antonio, Padua. But after Vallotti's death Sabbatini recommended Agostino Ricci, who served from 1780 to 1786. Sabbatini was then invited again to become maestro; he was nominated unanimously on 22 April 1786 and served from 18 June until his death. In May 1807 he was elected a member of the music group of the Accademia Italiana.

All Sabbatini's known music is sacred; much of it is in the orchestrally accompanied style of the day, but some is in a learned style using cantus firmus or strict contrapuntal devices such as canon and fugue. Of his own musical works only the short Atto di contrizione for two sopranos and continuo was published in his lifetime, but in 1803 he published an edition of Benedetto Marcello's psalm settings Estro poetico-armonico. His several published treatises on music place him beside F.A. Calegari, Vallotti and Tartini as an important theorist of the Paduan school and reflect his interest in their work; he is known to have made a copy of Calegari's Ampla dimostrazione degli armoniali musicali tuoni (now in F-Pn). His manuscript Trattato di contrappunto explains Tartini's terzo suono and Calegari's and Vallotti's theory of chord inversion. His study of Vallotti resulted in a biographical sketch published in 1780, and in his most important treatise, Trattato sopra le fughe musicali, in which he analysed Vallotti's so-called real, tonal and imitative fugues with the aid of two-, three- and four-part music examples. Musicians in Padua and Venice praised the work, and the governing board of S Antonio awarded Sabbatini a gold medal and named him Vallotti's true successor. Unlike the other Paduan theorists, he had an interest in the elementary instruction of children in music. In 1781 he endorsed Gennaro Catalisano's Grammatica armonica, fisico-matematica ... per uso della gioventù studiosa, and in 1789 and 1790 he published his Elementi teorici della musica with numerous duets and trios, with and without bass, for teaching beginners. Although Tebaldini considered his method of setting simple precepts to music childish, his contemporaries approved, and the book was reprinted in 1795; the music examples were published separately as Solfèges ou leçons élémentaires de musique in Paris in 1810 and 1834.

Sabbatini, Nicola. See SABATINO, NICOLA.

Sabbatini, Pietro Paolo (b Rome, 1598–9; d Rome, 24 Nov 1660). Italian composer and teacher. It is not known whether he was related to Galeazzo Sabbatini. He appears to have spent his life in Rome. In his youth he was probably a chorister and in 1614 appeared in the allegorical role of the 'Età dell'Oro' ('Golden Age') in the opera L'Amor pudico, performed at the Palazzo della Cancelleria. He was choirmaster at S Luigi dei Francesi from February 1629 until 30 April 1631. This seems to have been the only full-time post that he held, though he acted as choirmaster on feast days for several Roman institutions which did not support a permanent choir, incuding the Pantheon between 1623 and 1641, the Convertite between 1628 and 1633, and the Arciconfraternità della Morte et Orazione in 1628. He was also engaged by the citizens of Penne, in the Abruzzi, to provide music for their jubilee year procession to S Pietro in 1650. He derived at least part of his income from teaching: in his 1650 book, which includes instruction in continuo playing for beginners, he styled himself 'professore di musica'; the music of Il quarto de villanelle was collected for publication by one of his pupils, Pietro Simi, and dedicated to another, Girolamo Cosci; his 1641 book includes a trio by another pupil, G.D. Rutulini; Dante Anodaro and Simon Corsi, who are each represented by one song in Il terzo, may also have been pupils; and from 6 January 1652 until his death he was 'bidello puntatore' of the University of Rome. He composed quite a large amount of music, much of which is lost; several of his books were reprinted during his lifetime. His surviving output consists mainly of short strophic songs, spiritual as well as secular. His 1630 book, by contrast, contains music for double choir and organ. The Intermedii spirituali, a set of three dialogues for soloists and chorus, were probably written for performance at the church or oratory of S Maria dell' Orazione e Morte and may have been staged with costumes and acting.

JOHN WHENHAM

Sabbe, Herman (Leon Augusthe Bertha) (b Bruges, 24 Aug 1937). Belgian musicologist. After studying the cello at the Salzburg Mozarteum with Mainardi (1956), he studied at the University of Ghent, where he gained the doctorate in law in 1960 and the doctorate in musicology with a dissertation on serialism (under the supervision of Broeckx) in 1975. He was a prizewinner of the Belgian Royal Academy in 1976. He was appointed professor at the Free University of Brussels in 1980, and in 1984 became both professor at the University of Ghent and director of its Seminar of Musicology and Institute for Psychoacoustics and Electronic Music. His main areas of study are the history of Western music and musical culture, especially during the 19th and 20th centuries, and sociomusicology. He has also examined music theory and notation in the 20th century, and the composers Stockhausen and Pousseur. He is music critic for a number of papers, and editor of many journals, including Documenta musicae novae and Interface.

MARIE CORNAZ

Sabbekha. Instrument mentioned in Daniel. See BIBLICAL INSTRUMENTS, §3(xiii).

Sabian. Canadian firm of cymbal makers, based in Meductic, New Brunswick, founded in 1998 by Robert ZILDJIAN.

Sabicas [Agustín Castellón Campos] (b Pamplona, ?1907; d New York, 14 April 1990). Spanish flamenco guitarist. His name derived from an early love of broad beans (habas), which he called habicas or sabicas. Though of Gypsy origin, he is the only Navarrese to have achieved his status in flamenco. Self-taught, he played his first solo guitar recital aged seven in Pamplona; at ten he gave a concert in Madrid. He was then praised by Montoya at a Madrid club, La Villa Rosa. After touring Spain in the 1920s, Sabicas played to rapturous applause at a solo recital in the bullring in Seville in 1934. Three years later he left Spain with his lover, the dancer Carmen Amaya, after publicly declaring his support for the Spanish Republic. Together they toured the Americas, settling first in Mexico, then in New York. He remained there for the rest of his life, returning occasionally to Spain after 1967.

Sabicas's genius for melody and highly innovatory approach to traditional flamenco forms set him apart even from figures such as Montoya and Niño Ricardo. His many recordings give evidence of his innovations which by the 1970s had been absorbed by modern flamenco guitar style, including playing pizzicato in 6ths, arpeggios on all strings and the alzapua (hitting a string percussively) with the thumb alone.

JAMES WOODALL

Sabine, Wallace C(lement Ware) (b Richwood, OH, 13 June 1868; d Cambridge, MA, 10 Jan 1919). American acoustician. He studied at Ohio State University and Harvard, where he taught physics from 1890; between 1895 and 1919 he laid the foundations of architectural acoustics on the basic principles of engineering design. C.W. Eliot, president of Harvard, prevailed on Sabine to try to correct the serious problem of reverberation in the lecture hall of the Fogg Art Museum, his first acoustical project. At Eliot's urging he also served as consultant for the Boston Music Hall: his outstanding success there illustrated the effects that could be achieved when acoustical engineering design preceded construction. Sabine's discovery of the relation among reverberation time, absorbent capacity and the volume of an auditorium was a fundamental and new contribution; he earned a lasting reputation for the scope and perception of his work. It is indeed appropriate that the unit of sound-absorbing power is named the 'sabine'. His Collected Papers on Acoustics was published posthumously (Cambridge, MA, 1922/R).

Sabini, Ippolito. See SABINO, IPPOLITO.

Sabini [Sabino], Nicola (b ?Naples, *c*1675; d Naples, 1705). Italian composer. He was an important figure in the early development of Neapolitan opera buffa. After studying with Angelo Durante at the Conservatorio di Onofrio, he succeeded Durante in May 1699 as first maestro di cappella there. He left this position in 1702, perhaps because of illness; he died of tuberculosis.

Sabini's historically most interesting work was his scherzo drammatico, Il mondo abbattuto (text, S. de Falco), written in 1701 for the Feast of St Casimir and performed for the Congregazione de' Musici, of which he was a member, in S Giorgio Maggiore of the Pii Operarii Fathers. This comedy, of which the music has been lost, adumbrates later developments of the Neapolitan commercial comic theatre, with its mixture of Tuscan and Neapolitan dialects. Another dialect work, 'Cantata in lingua napoletana' Non cchiù Ciccillo mio, survives (in I-Nc). He also wrote a sacred opera, Innocenza trionfante, performed on 14 December 1704 at the Congregazione di S Caterina, Celano (some of the arias are by other composers), and Canzone a voce sola per la Purificazione della Vergine (1696, I-Nf).

Sabinin, Martha von [Sabinina, Marfa Stepanovna] (b Copenhagen, 30 May 1831; d Crimea, 14 Dec 1892). Russian pianist and composer. The daughter of the Eastern Orthodox priest to the Grand Duchess of Weimar, Sabinin was court pianist and teacher at the Noble Girls' Institute in Weimar (1854–60). Tsar Aleksandr II, nephew of the grand duchess, then appointed Sabinin music teacher to his children. She was a pupil of the Schumanns (1850–51), Peter Cornelius (1853–5) and Liszt (1853–60), who praised her 'musically well-tempered freedom and flow'. She wrote the text as well as the music for her choral work Franziskus-Lied and Liszt later set her text for male voices (soloists, chorus and instrumental ensemble) as An den heiligen Franziskus von Paula. She excelled in Classical and ensemble performance, and as the accompanist of such gifted singers as Johanna Wagner (niece of Richard Wagner). New artistic influences inspired her pieces for salon and court; songs to contemporary German Romantic lyrics led to the composition of music for melodramas and impressionistic piano solos. A nurse from 1868 with the tsarina's Sisters of the Annunciation, she served in the field (manning ambulances and establishing hospitals) during the Russo-Turkish war (1876–8) and subsequently became Abbess of the Crimean mother house.

PAULINE POCKNELL

Sabinina, Marina Dmitriyevna (b Petrograd (St Petersburg), 10 Sept 1917). Soviet musicologist. She graduated in 1948 from the faculty of theory and composition at Moscow Conservatory, and in 1951 completed her postgraduate studies there under Gruber. From 1952 to 1957 she was in charge of a section of the journal Sovetskaya muzïka, and in 1960 became a senior research fellow at the Institute for the History of the Arts (now the State Institute of Art Research). In 1974 she was awarded the doctorate for her dissertation Shostakovich – simfonist, and in 1976 was appointed to teach at Moscow Conservatory, where she later became professor (1978–82). She became a member of the Union of Soviet Composers in 1951. Sabinina's research has been devoted mainly to Soviet music and particularly to the works of Prokofiev and Shostakovich. In her writings on Shostakovich, she considers his work for the first time alongside the main trends of various art forms and in the context of contemporary artistic and political life. Likewise, in her study of the life and work of Musorgsky she has attempted, together with Golovinsky, to redefine the composer's artistic legacy, highlighting the distinctiveness of his aesthetic views and style and the fate of his works in the Soviet period. She has also specialized in music for the stage and has examined in detail the place, functions and forms of music in a dramatic presentation. An authoritative music journalist from the 1940s to the 1960s, Sabinina is noted for her professionalism and her work is enjoyable for its vivid literary style.

Sabino. Italian family of musicians, possibly related to Ippolito Sabino.

(1) Giovanni Maria Sabino (b Turi, nr Bari, 30 June 1588; d Naples, April 1649). Composer, organist and teacher. The son of Francesco (b ?Lanciano) he received his musical education from Prospero Testa in Naples, where he settled permanently and was ordained priest. He provided music for S Domenico Maggiore on 1 January 1622 and on 4 September of that year he became the first official maestro di cappella of the Conservatorio di S Maria della Pietà dei Turchini, a post that he held until the end of 1626. In the following year he became maestro of the royal church of S Barbara in the Castel Nuovo. He next was organist at the Oratorio di S Filippo, called 'Girolamini', from 1630 to 1634. From the latter year until his death he was maestro di cappella of the Casa dell'Annunziata: he was also a teacher there and played the organ. In 1640 he taught canto figurato at the Collegio delle Monache in S Maria di Costantinopoli. His last payment for providing music, for the Monte degli Agonizzanti in S Maria a Cellaro, is dated 26 January 1645. There is no evidence that Gregorio Strozzi, Giovanni Salvatore and Francesco Provenzale were among his pupils, although his musical style was adopted by them. He was the first Neapolitan to use violins in motet writing and to make systematic use of a virtuoso solo voice above an elaborate continuo. Before 1620 he received the title Cavaliere, possibly thanks to his connections with the musical circle of Prince Carlo Gesualdo, or with the royal chapel at the Spanish Palace. He was in contact with Trabaci and Andrea Falconieri there, whose sacred music survives in the same sources as Sabino.

(2) Donato Antonio [Antonino] Sabino (b Turi, 13 Feb 1591; d Naples, July 1650). Composer, organist and teacher, brother of (1) Giovanni Maria Sabino. He was a priest and spent his life in Naples. In October 1635 he was appointed organist of the Casa dell'Annunziata, where his brother was maestro di cappella. From May 1642 to 1643 Donato held the additional appointment of maestro di cappella of the Conservatorio dei Poveri di Gesù Cristo, where he taught music and singing, and in March or April 1646 he became maestro of the Monte degli Agonizzanti in S Maria a Cellaro. In the final year of his life he replaced Giovanni Maria as maestro of the Annunziata. As a composer, he is known only by sacred music, which has a distinctive archaic flavour owing to the full chordal and homophonic movement. His works for double choir and instruments are more 'modern'.

(3) Francesco Sabino (b Naples, *c*1618; d Naples, after 1660). Teacher and composer, nephew of (1) Giovanni Maria Sabino and (2) Donato Antonio Sabino. He spent his entire life in Naples and after receiving his musical education at home, his name first appears in connection with musical performances at the Casa Professa del Gesù in September 1645. On 29 December 1646 he signed a contract to teach Alessio D'Angelo, aged 16, singing, playing and counterpoint. He was one of the founders, on 23 January 1655, and governors of the Congregatione de musici di Napoli in S Giorgio Maggiore. His surviving motets (in I-Nf and Mdina, Malta) demonstrate a more forward-looking musical style than found in the work of his uncles, particularly in his use of instruments and imitation. One such motet in the Biblioteca Oratoriana dei Filippini, Naples, is attributed to 'Sabino III', probably Francesco given that other works in the same manuscript are attributed to 'Sabino I' (?(1) Giovanni Maria) and Sabino II (?(2) Donato Antonio). There is no known evidence of a family connection with Nicola Sabino (d Naples, 1705), maestro di cappella of the Conservatorio di S Onofrio and composer of oratorios and cantatas in Neapolitan dialect.

Sabino, Giovanni Francesco. Italian musician, son of IPPOLITO SABINO.

Sabino [Sabini], Ippolito (b Lanciano, *c*1550; d Lanciano, 25 Aug 1593). Italian composer; Giovanni Maria Sabino was probably related to him. Although he published 14 volumes of music, and single pieces by him appeared in about 30 collections between 1566 and 1619, very little is known about his career. The dedication of his Magnificat settings of 1587 to the canons and chapter of the church at Lanciano led Eitner to conclude that he was probably maestro di cappella there. This is plausible, though Sabino referred to himself simply as 'musician of Lanciano'. He addressed most of his dedications from Lanciano to local noblemen. His first published pieces – Pietosi miei lamenti and I' piango ed ella, the second a setting of the commiato of Petrarch's canzone Quando il soave (a poem that he later set in its entirety) – appeared in Rore's fifth book of five-part madrigals, a volume that includes works dedicated to Ottavio Farnese and Margaret of Austria, who had connections with cities near Lanciano. Around 1575 Sabino served in the cappella of the Cathedral of Ortona, and he dedicated his first book of masses to the cathedral's vicario. Both pieces belong to the polyphonic tradition, frequently employing double points of imitation and relying on skilful contrapuntal craftsmanship rather than on the chromatic writing characteristic of Rore. Sabino continued to write within the same tradition. He preferred six- and seven-part contrapuntal writing to lighter sonorities, but his later madrigals show an increasing use of chordal declamation for contrast. His harmonic language remained diatonic and unaffected by mannerist tendencies. In the preface to the second book of six-part madrigals (1581), Oratio Crisci indicated that he was a pupil of Sabino and that he wished to show his esteem for him by editing a selection of both his own and his teacher's works. The relationship between the two must have continued, for further madrigals by Crisci appeared in Sabino's volumes of 1587 and 1589. His son Giovanni Francesco Sabino is represented by four madrigals in the same books. Sabino's sacred publications survive incomplete; a mass from the print of 1575 is preserved, though incomplete, in manuscript in Wawel Cathedral, Kraków.

Saboly, Nicolas (b Monteux, bap. 31 Jan 1614; d Avignon, 25 July 1675). Provençal poet and composer. In 1628 he joined the Congregation of the Annunciation at the Jesuit college, Carpentras, and in 1630 received the tonsure. From 1628 to 1634 he studied at Avignon University. Ordained priest in 1635, he was maître de chapelle of Carpentras Cathedral from 1639 to 1643. He held the same position at Arles from 1643 to 1646, at Aix from 1652 to 1655, at Nîmes from 1659 and at St Pierre, Avignon, from 1668 until his death. He was awarded the degree of bachelor of laws by Avignon University in 1658. His reputation in Provence rests on his noëls, which he published (at first anonymously) in a series of booklets from 1668 to 1674. These include 62 in Provençal (two of which are described as 'Noé viei') and seven in French. They were designed to be sung to secular airs popular at the time, some of which are taken from Lully's operas. A complete edition of the Provençal noëls was published in 1699. Their liveliness, combined with a certain amount of local colour, has ensured their survival (see J.A. Westrup: 'Nicolas Saboly and his "Noëls Provençaux"', ML, xxi, 1940, 34–49). Two motets and two masses are attributed to Saboly, but he is not otherwise known as a composer.

Sabra, Wadi (b Beirut, 23 Feb 1876; d Beirut, 11 April 1952). Lebanese composer, organist and theoretician. He studied at the Syrian Protestant College in Beirut and from 1893 at the Paris Conservatoire, where he was a pupil of Lavignac (harmony), Lenepveu (composition), Widor and Guilmant (organ) and Bourgault-Ducoudray (history). After working as an organist at several churches in Paris (1893–1900) and at St Esprit (1902–10) he left for Istanbul to present his Turkish national hymn to the sultan. Later in 1910 he returned to Beirut, where he founded the Dār al-Mūsīqā (school of music). He went back to Paris after World War I and there collaborated with Gustave Lyon in studies of the Arabian scale, the ultimate aim being the construction of a piano according to their plans. The instrument was made and introduced into the Lebanon by Sabra in 1922; the firm of Pleyel produced an electric model. After residing in Egypt for some time, Sabra was recalled to the Lebanon as director of the National Conservatory (1925). He received from the French government the Palmes Académiques and the Rosette d'Officier de l'Instruction Publique, and in 1948 he was made a Chevalier of the Légion d'honneur.

Through his work in reforming scales, Western as well as Arabian, Sabra sought to unite the West Asian homophonic with the European harmonic system. In 1944 he convened a Universal Musical Congress in Beirut, at which he demonstrated the value of a system which, he claimed, 'opens a new era in musical science'. He composed three operas: The Shepherds of Canaan (the first opera in Turkish, text by Halide Edib Hanun), The Two Kings (the first opera in Arabic, text by Marun Ghusn) and L'émigré (in French). His other works include the oratorio Le chant de Moïse, the cantata Les voix de Noël, 20 Lebanese folksong arrangements and the national anthem of Lebanon.

Sacabuche (Old Sp.). See TROMBONE.

Sacadas [Sakadas] of Argos (*fl c*580 BCE). Greek aulos player and poet. He wrote lyric and elegiac poems, but none has survived. He provided his elegiac verses with musical settings (during the central classical period elegy had no accompaniment). According to Pseudo-Plutarch (On Music, 1134a–c, 1135c), he was a skilled aulete who three times carried off the prize at the Pythian games, beginning in 586 BCE. The reawakening of musical culture at Sparta after Terpander's great initial changes was ascribed to Sacadas and a few others who kept the exalted Terpandrian manner but introduced new rhythms.

Pausanias's Description of Greece (ii.22.8–9, iv.27.7, vi.14.9–10, ix.30.2, x.7.4) contains the additional point that Sacadas was the first to perform the 'Pythian aulos tune' at Delphi. This was not an auloedic NOMOS but an auletic one, that is an extended piece for solo aulos in which the music itself is highly descriptive or evocative. In some way Sacadas portrayed the victorious combat of APOLLO with the serpent, the Python. Strabo (Geography, ix.3.10) provides a rather detailed description of such a piece composed of five parts, the last of which imitates the final hissing of the python as it expires, but he did not specifically attribute it to Sacadas. A somewhat different description of the piece (though still in five parts), specifically attributed to Sacadas, is provided by lexicographer Pollux (Onomasticon, iv.78, 84). Of course, certainly more than one piece may have existed on this subject. In addition to the Pythic nomos, Sacadas is also credited (Pseudo-Plutarch, On Music, 1134a–b) with the Trimere (three-part) nomos, consisting of a strophe in each of the three basic tonoi, Dorian, Phrygian and Lydian.

The aulos nomoi of Sacadas were still popular more than two centuries later: in 369 BCE, at the founding of Messene, the builders worked to the accompaniment of his Boeotian melodies and those composed by the Theban aulete PRONOMUS (Pausanias, iv.27.7). The range and brilliance of his accomplishments made him the outstanding musical performer of the 6th century BCE; Pindar composed a prelude (prooimion) in his honour (Pausanias, ix.30.2 = Bowra, frag.282a).

Saccadé (Fr.: 'jerked'). A kind of bowing in which, usually, the second of two notes under a slur is sharply accented. Described in detail by Baillot (1834), it is similar to what Spohr (1832) called 'the Viotti bowing'. See BOW, §II, 3(ii).

PETER WALLS

Sacchetti, Franco (b Ragusa, between 1332 and 1334; d San Miniato, 1400). Italian writer and poet, the son of a Florentine merchant in Ragusa (now Dubrovnik). The family moved to Florence and Franco began writing love lyrics while in his early twenties, modelling his works after Dante and Boccaccio. In 1363 he launched an active career in politics and travelled widely as a podestà and merchant. A political upheaval, the death of his wife (1377) and his brother, Giannozzo (beheaded on 17 October 1379), were tragic events, the sadness of which is reflected in his late writings. He was also involved with Florentine companies of laudesi.

His major works are: Battaglia delle belle donne (1352–4), Sposizioni di Vangeli (1378–81), Trecentonovelle (begun not before 1392) and Libro delle rime (ed. F. Brambilla Ageno, Florence and Perth, 1990), begun in 1380 and continued until his death; the two rime are included in his autograph (I-Fl Ashburn.574). The autograph ascribes musical settings of 17 ballette, 14 madrigals and two cacce to the most distinguished composers active in Florence (Niccolò da Perugia, Francesco Landini, Gherardello, Lorenzo da Firenze, Donato da Cascia and Guilielmus de Francia), while other composers are mentioned whose music is totally lost (Ottolino da Brescia, Gherardello's sons Jacopo and Giovanni and his brother Jacopo, and Sacchetti himself). Music actually survives for only 12 poems.

Sacchetti [Sakketti], Liberio [Livery] Antonovich (b Kenzar, Tambov govt., 18/30 Aug 1852; d Petrograd, 26 Feb/10 March 1916). Russian musicologist. He was the son of an Italian music teacher who had settled in Russia in the late 1840s. He studied at the St Petersburg Conservatory, graduating from Davïdov's cello class in 1874 and Rimsky-Korsakov's composition class in 1878. In 1886 he was appointed to the newly founded chair in music history and aesthetics at the St Petersburg Conservatory. His lectures were so popular that in 1889 he was asked to give a similar series at the Academy of Fine Arts. From 1895 he worked with Stasov at the Imperial Library in St Petersburg. He was the official delegate of the Russian Musical Society at Bologna (1888) and also at Paris (1900), where he presented a paper on Russian church music. He wrote several useful textbooks and histories of music, and his writings on aesthetics were highly regarded by his contemporaries.

JENNIFER SPENCER

Sacchi, Giovenale (b Milan, 22 Nov 1726; d Milan, 27 Sept 1789). Italian mathematician, music theorist and writer. He studied with the Barnabites and in 1742 entered their order. From 1749, having completed his studies in philosophy in Pavia, he taught rhetoric at the Scuole di S Giovanni alle Vigne in Lodi. His career reached a turning-point in 1758 when he was appointed to the chair of rhetoric at the Collegio dei Nobili in Milan, a post he held until the year of his death. He was in contact with Padre Martini, who encouraged his musical writings, and was also acquainted with Pietro Verri, Parini, Stanislao Mattei, Riccati, Giulini and Gerbert. In 1761 he published the first of several theoretical treatises on music, in 1778 a work on ancient Greek music and in the 1780s biographies of Farinelli and Benedetto Marcello. Fétis praised his erudition and science, but held that his views reflected a lack of intimate knowledge of music, criticizing his Della divisione del tempo nella musica, nel ballo e nella poesia (Milan, 1770) for its vagueness. Sacchi's Delle quinte successive nel contrappunto e delle regole degli accompagnamenti (Milan, 1780) contains an attack on Rameau's fundamental bass and his concept of inversions.

FERRUCCIO TAMMARO/R

Sacchini, Antonio (Maria Gasparo Gioacchino) (b Florence, 14 June 1730; d Paris, 6 Oct 1786). Italian composer, a leading figure in serious opera of the late 18th century.

1. LIFE. When Antonio was four, his father Gaetano, a cook, attached himself to the retinue of the Infante Don Carlos and accompanied them to Naples. At the age of ten Antonio entered the Conservatorio S Maria di Loreto to study the violin with Nicola Fiorenza. He also studied singing with Gennaro Manna, and the harpsichord, organ and composition with Francesco Durante, who esteemed him highly and predicted that he would be 'the composer of the century'. He was asked to serve as mastricello in 1756, the same year that his first theatrical work, the intermezzo Fra Donato, was performed by the students at the conservatory and in various houses throughout the city and province. The success of Fra Donato and of Il giocatore, a second intermezzo written for the conservatory in 1757, brought invitations to compose comic works for two Neapolitan theatres – the Teatro Nuovo and the Teatro dei Fiorentini. In January 1758 he was nominated maestro di cappella straordinario at the conservatory, an unpaid post in which he assisted Manna, the primo maestro, and Pierantonio Gallo, the secondo maestro. When Manna retired in May 1761, Gallo became primo maestro and Sacchini secondo maestro. In the same month Andromaca, his first opera seria, was performed at the Teatro S Carlo, Naples. On 12 October 1762 he was granted leave to go to Venice, where he composed Alessandro Severo for the Teatro S Benedetto and Alessandro nell'Indie for the Teatro S Salvatore. Neglecting to return to his duties in Naples, he proceeded to Padua, where on 9 July 1763 his Olimpiade was such an overwhelming success that it was performed throughout Italy. Further triumphs in Rome, Naples and Florence led him to abandon his post at the conservatory for a career as an opera composer.

For the next few years Sacchini lived in Rome, where he composed for the Teatro Valle a number of comic works which achieved fame throughout Europe, including Il finto pazzo per amore (1765), La contadina in corte (1765) and L'isola d'amore (1766). In 1768 he moved to Venice, where he became director of the Conservatorio dell'Ospedaletto. He quickly gained a reputation as an excellent singing teacher (Nancy Storace and Adriana Gabrieli were among his pupils). He composed several oratorios for the conservatory and numerous sacred pieces for Venetian churches. In early 1770 he visited Germany to compose operas for Munich and Stuttgart, and then returned to his post in Venice, where for the next two years he combined his teaching with the composing of successful operas for the major Italian theatres.

In 1772 Sacchini moved to London, where he remained for nearly ten years. Burney described Il Cid (January 1773) and Tamerlano (May 1773), his first operas for the English capital, as > equal, if not superior, to any musical dramas I had heard in any part of Europe. The airs of Millico, the first man, were wholly written in the delicate and pathetic style of that singer; as the first woman's part was in the spirited and nervous style of Girelli. And he cherished the talents of the inferior singers in so judicious a manner, that all their defects were constantly disguised or concealed.

When Traetta arrived in London in 1776 his opera failed miserably because, according to Burney, 'Sacchini had already taken possession of our hearts, and so firmly established himself in the public favour, that he was not to be supplanted by a composer in the same style'. But Sacchini's dissolute life created many enemies and eventually brought financial ruin. His former friend, the singer Venanzio Rauzzini, went so far as to claim many of the composer's most famous arias as his own.

Faced with the threat of imprisonment, Sacchini left England in 1781 and went to Paris. He was already famous there because of performances of his La colonie (L'isola d'amore) in 1775 and L'olimpiade (Olimpiade) in 1777, in adaptations by Framery. The success of these works had delighted the Piccinni supporters, who attempted to draw Sacchini to Paris as an ally in their struggle with the Gluck supporters. In autumn 1781 the composer appeared at Versailles, where he was presented to Marie Antoinette and received with enthusiasm. Joseph II of Austria was also visiting the French court at that time and, being particularly fond of Italian opera, he recommended Sacchini to his sister's protection. Determined to keep the composer in France, the queen persuaded the directors of the Opéra to accept his demand for 10,000 francs for each of three operas.

1. Antonio Sacchini: engraving by Luigi Rados after G.B. Bosio

From the very first, Sacchini found himself the object of intrigue and ill-will. M de la Ferté, the intendant des Menus-Plaisirs, contrived to stall the performance of his first opera for Paris, Renaud, and to draw attention to the queen's preference for foreign composers, while the Gluck supporters attempted to estrange the composer from his Piccinnist supporters. When Renaud was finally performed on 28 February 1783 it was not well received. The Piccinni faction asserted that the score (an adaptation of his Armida of 1772) was influenced by Gluck, while the Gluck supporters condemned the work for lacking dramatic power and originality. Sacchini's next opera, Chimène, was performed at Fontainebleau on 18 November 1783 in an atmosphere of open rivalry with Piccinni, whose Didon had been performed two days earlier and proclaimed a masterpiece. Although Chimène suffered in comparison, receiving only one performance while Didon received three, both composers were presented to the king (Sacchini by the queen herself) and given a large pension. Chimène was first performed at the Opéra on 9 February 1784 and received 16 performances. The Mercure de France found the work full of musical beauty but dramatically weak because of unnecessary arias and ritornellos.

The music for Sacchini's next opera, Dardanus, was completely original, and with this opera and those that followed, he attempted to create works that conformed to the ideals of French music drama. The failure of Dardanus can be attributed in part to an undramatic libretto and an inadequate staging brought about by his enemies at the Opéra. In autumn 1785 the queen had Dardanus given at Fontainebleau in a revised version, which proved a success. In the same year Sacchini completed his Oedipe à Colone, which the queen had promised would be the first opera to be performed at Fontainebleau during the court's forthcoming stay there, but mounting criticism of her preference for foreigners forced her to revoke her pledge and to cede the honoured place to the French composer Lemoyne. Sacchini's beloved pupil, Henri Berton, asserted that this disappointment contributed greatly to the composer's death, which occurred shortly afterwards on 6 October 1786, although Sacchini had been suffering many years from gout and the effects of dissipation. Oedipe was performed at the Opéra on 1 February 1787 and hailed as his masterpiece (fig.2). The work formed a standard part of the repertory until 1830 with 583 performances. Arvire et Evelina, Sacchini's last opera, was completed by Rey, the conductor of the Opéra orchestra, and given its première in Paris on 29 April 1788. Although it did not gain the popularity of Oedipe, it was heard in Paris until 1827 and had 95 performances.

2. Works. The high esteem that Sacchini enjoyed in the judgments of his contemporaries must certainly be modified and put into perspective from a present-day vantage point. In 1770 Burney considered him one of the four greatest composers of Italy, along with Jommelli, Galuppi and Piccinni. While he placed Piccinni supreme in the comic style, he nominated Sacchini 'the most promising composer in the serious'. He described Il Cid and Tamerlano as 'so entire, so masterly, yet so new and natural, that there was nothing left for criticism to censure, though innumerable beauties to point out and admire'. A critic of the next generation, Giuseppe Carpani, hailed Sacchini as the world's greatest melodist. Indeed, his serious operas display an exceptional gift for melody, and although these melodies are not strikingly original, they are immediately appealing and encompass a wide range of emotional expression. On the other hand, the melodies in his comic works are often similar in character and tend to be monotonous. In general, his style is typical of the late Classical era with its simplicity of texture and balanced phrase structure. At times, however, the Mozartian melodic line gives way to expansive phrases that bring to mind the lyric style of the 19th century. Sacchini's harmony tends to be richer than that of most of his contemporary Italian opera composers, and especially effective is his judicious use of diminished seventh chords, dominants of degrees of the scale other than the tonic, and augmented sixth chords. He often achieved dramatic tension through the use of changing harmonies over a tonic pedal point or with a sudden change from major to minor. The instrumental accompaniment is employed in such a way that it enhances but never detracts from the vocal line. As Burney observed, 'his accompaniments, though always rich and ingenious, never call off attention from the voice, but, by a constant transparency, the principal melody is rendered distinguishable through all the contrivances of imitative and picturesque design in the instruments'. The virtuoso character of the violin parts in many of the ritornellos and the care with which he notated the accompanimental figures reflect a thorough mastery of this instrument.

2. Opening of Act 1 scene i from Sacchini's 'Oedipe à Colone', from the first edition of the score (Paris: Imbault, 1787)

Sacchini employed a variety of aria forms. Only rarely did he adhere to the complete da capo form, but he often made use of altered versions of this basic plan. He also made frequent use of a cavatina-like two-part aria that approximates to the A portion of the da capo form, and of the vocal rondò, in both comic and serious works. Through-composed arias are occasionally found in his comic operas, while in the French works one finds the cavatina-cabaletta combination that was to become so popular in the 19th century. Sacchini's accompanied recitatives are characterized by exceptional dramatic power and often combine with the following aria to form a unified musical scene through the use of common motivic material. Transitional portions of the aria itself are frequently written in the manner of accompanied recitative.

In his ensembles Sacchini was only partly successful in his attempt to define musically the various characters. In the comic works the action continues through the ensemble and is reflected by quick changes of tempo and musical character, although the key centre is generally constant. The chorus remained insignificant in his operas until his London period. Burney reported that Sacchini, > finding how fond the English were of Handel's oratorio choruses, introduced solemn and elaborate choruses into some of his operas; but though excellent in their kind, they never had a good effect: the mixture of English singers with the Italian, as well as the awkward figure they cut, as actors, joined to the difficulty of getting their parts by heart, rendered those compositions ridiculous, which in still life would have been admirable.

Especially effective, however, are the impressive choral scenes in the French operas in which the chorus alternates with soloists in rondo fashion. Indeed, the many choruses and scenes of spectacle in his last operas not only show the strong influence of Gluck but also point the way to the grand opera of Spontini. Dardanus and Oedipe emerge as true lyric dramas from which all unnecessary ritornellos and airs have been shorn. The great fluidity in combining accompanied recitative, arioso and aria and the variety and attention to detail in the orchestration are used to excellent effect to mirror the changing emotions of the text. With his masterpiece, Oedipe, Sacchini admirably achieved a synthesis of Italian melodic style and Gluckian principles within a French dramatic framework.

DAVID DiCHIERA (work-list with JOYCE JOHNSON ROBINSON)

Sacconi, (Simone) Fernando (b Rome, 30 May 1895; d Point Lookout, Long Island, NY, 26 June 1973). Italian maker and restorer of violins. While still at school he became a workshop assistant to Giuseppe Rossi, a pupil of Degani. By the time he was 16, Sacconi already had his own clientèle, and a particular ability as a maker of copies.

In 1931 he moved to New York to work for the dealer Emil Herrmann. He continued to make new instruments – and occasionally bows – but his time there was mainly taken up with repairs and restoration work. In this field he had no equal, an example of his work being a Stradivari of the best period, virtually destroyed in an accident in 1948, which now shows no sign of having suffered. In the imitation of old Italian varnish he excelled all rivals. In 1951 Sacconi went with his pupil D'Attili to work for Rembert Wurlitzer. A first-class workshop was built up and many of the best American repairers were trained in it. In his last years he spent much time teaching in Cremona, Italy, and published I segreti di Stradivari (Cremona, 1972), setting out in detail Stradivari's working methods.

Sacerdote, David [Sacerdoti, Davit de] (b Rovere; *fl c*1575). Italian composer. He was a member of the thriving Jewish community in 16th-century Mantua which, despite escalating persecution, made vital contributions to the theatrical and musical life at court, particularly in the last 30 years of the century. Sacerdote's first and only known publication, Il primo libro de madrigali a sei voci (Venice, 1575, inc.), is prefaced by an encomiastic sonnet to the composer by Cavaliere Nuvolone, a prominent member of the Accademia degli Invaghiti, founded in Mantua by Cesare Gonzaga in 1562. The volume is dated from Casale on 25 January 1575, and is dedicated to the Marchese del Vasto who seems to have been Sacerdote's patron. It includes settings of one sonnet by Ariosto and four from Petrarch's Canzoniere. Individual madrigals are dedicated to the Duke of Mantua, the Marchese del Vasto, the Prior of Barletta (who was usually a Gonzaga), and to various ladies from distinguished Mantuan families, including Isabella Madrucci. One of the Petrarch texts, Lieti fiori e felici, was also set in the anonymous Madrigali a cinque voci (RISM 1583[13]) which can be ascribed to Duke Guglielmo Gonzaga of Mantua.

Sacher, Paul (b Basle, 28 April 1906; d Basle, 26 May 1999). Swiss conductor, archivist and musical patron. He studied conducting with Weingartner and Moser at the Basle Conservatory and musicology with Karl Nef at the University of Basle. In 1926 he founded the Basle Chamber Orchestra, to which the affiliated Basle Chamber Choir was added in 1928. Both were organized for the exploration of unusual music from the pre-Classical and modern periods. Five years later he created the Schola Cantorum Basiliensis as an institute for research into early music. His explorations of little-known repertory went as far as early Mozart and Haydn and his Basle première of Idomeneo in 1931 helped restore this Mozart opera to the canon. In 1954 he combined the Schola Cantorum with both the conservatory and Musikschule to create the Musikakademie der Stadt Basel, a group that has since become a major centre of musicological and performance research. Sacher served as the Musikakademie's first director, from 1954 to 1969. In 1941 he expanded his base to include Zürich, where he directed the Collegium Musicum for many years and pursued a similar exploration of new and old music. He appeared as a guest conductor in America and Europe (including the Glyndebourne, Edinburgh, Lucerne and Aix-en-Provence festivals), and was especially esteemed for his performances of the work of the Second Viennese School.

Paul Sacher

As a tireless champion of 20th-century music, Sacher had few equals. He commissioned over 200 works by major composers, including Bartók, Berio, Birtwistle, Boulez, Britten, Carter, Dutilleux, Henze, Hindemith, Honegger, Ibert, Krenek, Lutosławski, Malipiero, Martin, Martinů, Strauss, Stravinsky and Tippett, often conducting the premières himself; these included Bartók's Divertimento and Strauss's Metamorphosen. He had the talent to make such a career succeed and the wealth of his wife helped to make it possible. His father-in-law, Maja Stehlin Hoffmann, founded the Hoffmann-La Roche pharmaceutical firm; and as with Beecham and Koussevitzky, such an alliance was of crucial importance to his career. Sacher's philanthropy saw the purchase and preservation of the entire Stravinsky archive in 1983, and its merger into the new Paul Sacher Foundation in 1986. This organization has also obtained and preserved the archives of Maderna, Martin, Webern and Sacher himself. For his 70th birthday, 12 composers (Beck, Berio, Boulez, Britten, Dutilleux, Fortner, Ginastera, Halffter, Henze, Holliger, Huber and Lutosławski) wrote new works in his honour. Sacher also made a number of influential recordings, including works by Dutilleux, Honegger, Stravinsky and Lutosławski. A collection of his writings, Reden und Aufsätze, was published in Zürich in 1986.

Sachlichkeit, Neue. See NEUE SACHLICHKEIT.

Sachs, Curt (b Berlin, 29 June 1881; d New York, 5 Feb 1959). American musicologist of German birth. He attended the Französisches Gymnasium in his native city while at the same time taking lessons in piano, music theory and composition with Leo Schrattenholz. He then went to Berlin University and, though he also studied music history with Fleischer, Kretzschmar and Wolf, it was in the history of art that he took the doctorate (1904) with a dissertation on Verrocchio's sculpture. He then pursued a career as an art historian, helping to edit the Monatshefte für kunstwissenschaftliche Literatur and working at the Kunstgewerbe Museum in Berlin. In 1909, however, he began to devote himself wholly to music. After military service in World War I, Sachs joined Hornbostel at the Berlin Phonogramm-Archiv and co-authored the seminal article 'Systematik der Musikinstrumente' (1914), which laid out a new basis for the systematic classification of Western and non-Western instruments. In 1920 he was appointed director of the Staatliche Instrumentensammlung, which was then attached to the Staatliche Akademie Hochschule für Musik, Berlin. (It became part of the Staatliches Institut für Deutsche Musikforschung in 1935.) Sachs completely reorganized this distinguished collection of musical instruments, having many of the instruments restored so that they could be heard. At the same time he was an external lecturer at the university, becoming reader in 1921 and professor in 1928; he also taught at the Hochschule für Musik and the Akademie für Kirchen- und Schulmusik. In addition he held various advisory posts in German museums and in the official educational establishment. In 1930 and 1932, for example, he was invited to Cairo by the Egyptian government to serve as a consultant on oriental music.

Being Jewish, Sachs was deprived of all his academic positions in 1933; he went to Paris, where he worked with André Schaeffner at the ethnological museum, the Musée de l'Homme (then Musée du Trocadéro), and taught at the Sorbonne. In 1934 he began the series of historical recordings, L'Anthologie Sonore, which provided an introduction to the sound of early music for several generations of students. In 1937 he emigrated to the USA; from 1937 to 1953 he was professor of music at New York University. Besides being a consultant at the New York Public Library, and serving as visiting professor from time to time at various American universities (Harvard, Northwestern and Michigan), Sachs also lectured regularly at Columbia University in New York, where he was made adjunct professor from 1953 until his death. In the last decade of his life he received various honorary degrees, including honorary doctorates from Hebrew Union College and from the Free University of Berlin; the West German government appointed him an Ordinarius emeritus; the Deutsche Gesellschaft für Musikforschung made him an honorary member; he was president of the American Musicological Society (1950–52) and honorary president of the American Society for Ethnomusicology.

Curt Sachs was a giant among musicologists, as much because of his astounding mastery of a number of subjects as because of his ability to present a comprehensive view of a vast panorama. This latter talent made him a generalist or popularizer in the best sense of the word, a qualification which should not obscure the fact that he developed new fields of inquiry. Indeed his achievement in synthesizing countless facts into a comprehensible whole is all the more impressive since he often dealt with previously unexplored areas. Sachs was one of the founders of comparative musicology ('vergleichende Musikwissenschaft'), a forerunner of ethnomusicology, and of modern organology. He not only devised (together with Erich von Hornbostel) the classification scheme for instruments that has gained universal acceptance, but he also wrote a standard dictionary of instruments (1914), a model catalogue of one of the world's great collections (1922) and an important history of instruments (1940). His studies in the music of the ancient world produced several standard surveys of the field as well as a number of provocative essays. His fascination with the nature of the musical experience led him to an important study of rhythm and tempo, and his concern with the relationship between music and the other arts inspired his world history of the dance and his major cultural historical study, The Commonwealth of Art (1946). Although his methodologies have been criticized for the biases which, as a product of the Berlin 'cultural-historical' school, they inevitably inherited, his contributions are still highly valued. Sachs was a great teacher and a warm and vital person, beloved by his many students. He was filled to overflowing with ideas and with energy; the amount of work he produced in his busy life was prodigious.

HOWARD MAYER BROWN

Sachs, Hans (b Nuremberg, 5 Nov 1494; d Nuremberg, 19 Jan 1576). German poet and Meistersinger. From 1501 to 1509 he attended the grammar school in Nuremberg, and thereafter learnt the trade of shoemaking. The years

Hans Sachs: engraving by Jost Amman, 1576

1511 to 1516 were his journeyman years, during which he travelled the length and breadth of Germany. After his return to Nuremberg he became a master shoemaker in 1520. He led a settled life of increasing wealth and hardly ever left Nuremberg again .

Sachs was born at a time when the imperial city of Nuremberg was at the height of its economic and cultural development. As early as 1509–11 he joined the Meistersinger guild that had existed in Nuremberg since the 15th century. His teacher was the linen weaver Lienhard Nunnenbeck. It was through Sachs that a MEISTERGESANG was brought into the service of the Reformation from 1520 onwards, and the Meistersinger guild at Nuremberg became the model for similar guilds in many German cities including Augsburg, Ulm, Breslau, Colmar and Strasbourg.

Sachs's massive artistic output, totalling over 6000 poetic works, comprises Meisterlieder, satirical and didactic poems in rhyming couplets (Spruchgedichte), prose dialogues, Shrovetide plays, comedies and tragedies. He produced 13 Meistertöne (see TON (i)), and composed melodies for them all. The most famous of these is his Silberweise. In his works Sachs tried above all to make religious and secular knowledge of the period as fully available as possible to his middle- and lower-class audience. His posthumous fame was assured above all by Goethe's Erklärung eines alten Holzschnittes, vorstellend Hans Sachsens poetische Sendung (1776) and by Wagner's Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg (1868).

HANS HEINRICH EGGEBRECHT/KARL-HEINZ SCHLAGER

Sachtleben, August(us) (b Quedlinburg, Germany, 18 Feb 1829; d London, 18/19 July 1901). American publisher and organist of German birth. He arrived in Galveston, Texas, on 3 November 1851; within a year he was serving as organist at the town's Trinity Episcopal Church. By 1858 he was advertising musical instruments and sheet music for sale at his Tremont Music Hall premises; a 'circulating music library' was also announced. Sachtleben gave piano recitals in Galveston, Houston and New Orleans and in 1861 he published the first of at least 30 piano works, some of which he had composed himself.

In 1867 Sachtleben was commissioned to supervise the construction of an organ at Trinity Church, Galveston; however, almost as soon as it was completed in May 1870 members of the congregation voiced their dissatisfaction with the instrument. The organ was offered for sale in 1871 but the instrument collapsed on 30 June 1872. Despite this disaster Sachtleben returned as the church's organist between 1881 and 1884. Sachtleben was the first significant commercial music publisher in Texas; through his publications, circulating library, performances and teaching activities the European art music repertory was spread from New Orleans into Texas and the American Southwest.

Sack, Johann Philipp (b Harzgerode, 11 Nov 1722; d Berlin, 14 Sept 1763). German composer. He moved to Magdeburg in 1742 and later became instructor at the orphanage there. In 1747 he obtained a similar position at the Berlin Cathedral School, and in 1749 he and several other musicians founded the Musikübende Gesellschaft, an organization that sponsored private and public concerts. He was appointed organist at Berlin Cathedral in 1756. Sack's compositions consist primarily of simple strophic lieder and short keyboard pieces. However, the three exceptionally fine lieder published in Kleine Clavierstücke nebst einigen Oden (1760) have a cantata-like structure with an independent accompaniment, and are among the first to be written on three staves.

DAVID OSSENKOP

Sackbut (i) (Fr. sacqueboute; Sp. sacabuche). A term used from the late 15th century to the 18th for a brass instrument operated using a telescopic slide, i.e. the TROMBONE. It has appeared in a variety of spellings (e.g. in England, 'sagbut', 'shakbush' and 'shagbut'). It is derived from the French sacquer ('to remove violently') and bouter ('to shove'), and thereby describes the movements of the player. The earliest mention of a sackbut is found in the description of the entertainments for the wedding of Charles the Bold to Margaret of York at Bruges in 1468, which records the performance of a piece of vocal music by the Flemish wind players of the Burgundian court using three shawms and a trompette saicqueboute. This description of the slide principle at work on a brass instrument is analogous to such later terms as drauchit trumpet (Scotland, 1505) and Zugtrommet (Germany, late 16th century). The early use of the word may have referred to instruments with a single slide (see SLIDE TRUMPET). However, since single-slide instruments were eventually superseded by those with double slides, the term 'sackbut' is primarily associated with the early trombone, in which sense it is used by players of the modern early music revival. The instrument has always been called trombone in Italy and Posaune in Germany.

Sackbut (ii). See under ORGAN STOP.

Sackman, Nicholas (b London, 12 April 1950). English composer. He studied at Nottingham University (1969–72) and Leeds University (1972–4) where his teachers included Alexander Goehr. His early works were performed at festivals both in Britain and abroad: Ensembles and Cadenzas featured at the 1972 Gaudeamus Festival and the BBC Young Composers' Forum, and A Pair of Wings was performed at the 1974 ISCM Festival (The Hague) and the Bath Festival. After teaching in London and Hertfordshire he was appointed to a lectureship at Nottingham University in 1990. He has received commissions from the Leeds Festival and the universities of Birmingham and Nottingham, among others. His major orchestral score, Hawthorn (inspired by Glyn Hughes' novel The Hawthorn Goddess), first performed at the 1993 Promenade Concerts, was written for the BBC. His teaching experience has also stimulated the production of challenging music for amateur performers, ranging from musicals for schools to scores for youth orchestra.

Sackman's music refuses easy categorization, falling into no recognizable stylistic school and betraying no obvious influences apart from an early engagement with the music of Berio and Birtwistle. His style is a potent synthesis of intellectual control and atmospheric suggestion, using instrumental colour and intricate counterpoint never for their own sake, but always as part of a cogent structural argument. Strong characteristics of his work are the emergence of lyrical melodies from complex and finely wrought textures, and the stratification and juxtaposition of contrasting ideas. In several scores he has reworked music from various historical periods, borrowing material from Machaut (Paraphrase), Mozart (String Quartet no.2) and Gombert (Cecilia Dances); in these works, constantly evolving structures gradually unfold the musical quotations, which appear to emerge with natural inevitability from within a contemporary idiom.

Sá Couto (Lagoncinha), Manoel de (b Ponte da Lagoncinha, nr Lousado, 31 May 1768; d 8 Nov 1837). Portuguese organ builder. Amorim states that he learned his craft from a monk at Tibães, near Ponte de Lima. Circumstantial evidence suggests that this could have been Frei Domingos de S José Varela (1762–?1834), author of a Compendio de música (1806), even though Sá Couto was his senior. It is also likely that Sá Couto and possibly Varela might have been influenced by António Solha (d 1794), who completed a large new organ at Tibães in 1785. Similarities in design and appearance are discernable in instruments by Solha and those of Sá Couto in the older Baroque style.

Surviving documents (cited in Pinho Brandão) attest that Sá Couto was recognized as a master organ builder at the age of 29. Possibly his most important organ is the instrument (1799, augmented 1802) in the newly rebuilt church of the Ordem Terceira de S Francisco, Oporto. The new church, commenced in 1793, was the first to be built in the neo-classical style in Oporto, and it inspired a wave of such buildings. The organ was designed to synthesize with the building and its fabric. It is almost certain that many older organs in the Baroque tradition were replaced by organs of more modern appearance by Sá Couto. Nonetheless, some organs by this builder were still in the Baroque tradition, e.g. the organ in the pilgrimage church of Bom Jesus do Monte. Façades which are predominantly neo-classical in appearance, such as the one at Nossa Senhora da Abadia, Amares (1797–8), retain some Baroque and Rococo elements in the decoration of the upper façade.

Sá Couto was probably the last important Portuguese organ builder. His successors were content to modernize earlier organs or experiment with hybrid designs. Although most of his organs have been much changed, there is sufficient technical evidence to suggest that the general specifications were little different to organs built half a century earlier. The tonal scheme was still based on a foundation of Flautados (similar to English and American Tibias), mixtures and reeds, with a few significant changes. The organ at Amares had no unusual stops and a compass of 54 notes. The compass of the organ for the Ordem Terceira at Oporto is C–f‴ (55 notes). It included a Flautado napolitana, and a Violin and an Octave Violin were later added as bass registers in the echo organ. The organ originally in S Maria de Bouro, Amares (1832–33; moved in 1854–5 to Bom Jesus do Monte, Braga), one of Sá Couto's larger instruments, included the Flautado napolitana and a treble English Cornet of four ranks, with a compass extending to g‴. The stops were classified by the use of inlays and stop-knobs of different designs. These features, which are not common, are similar to those found on the organs by Machado e Cerveira. There is no evidence of foreign traditions in the mechanical or tonal design of organs built by Sá Couto except for the stops mentioned, which were unusual in Portuguese organs of the era.

His other identified work includes organs in the following churches and monasteries: convent of S Maria Magdalena, Santo Tirso (before 1797), Nossa Senhora dos Remédios, Braga (1810), S Vitor, Braga (1816), and Ordem Terceira de S Francisco, Ponte de Lima (1825–6). Undated organs in Braga include those at Nossa Senhora da Lapa da Arcadia, Nossa Senhora da Boa Morte, S Marcos (formerly at S Martinho, Tibães), Nossa Senhora a Branca and S Pedro de Maximos.

Sacramentary (from Lat. sacramentarium, liber sacramentorum). A liturgical book of the Western Church used by the officiating bishop or priest at the eucharistic liturgy. Sacrati, Francesco (b Parma, bap. 17 Sept 1605; d ?Modena, 20 May 1650). Italian composer. He was active in Venice as an opera composer during the early 1640s, always in collaboration with the scenographer Giacomo Torelli. He may subsequently have belonged to the Accademici Discordati, an itinerant troupe which performed one of his operas in Bologna and possibly elsewhere. He was maestro di cappella of the 'musici di Bologna', who in March 1648 were invited to perform his opera La finta pazza in Reggio nell'Emilia. Sacrati spent part of that year at the Villa Malvasia at Panzano near Bologna, where he composed L'isola di Alcina. In 1649 he became maestro di cappella of Modena Cathedral. Sacrati was highly esteemed by his contemporaries, including Prince Mattias de' Medici, a close acquaintance, and the librettist Giacomo Badoaro in L'Ulisse errante likened him to Monteverdi as the moon to the sun. La finta pazza, taken to Paris in December 1645 by Torelli and the ballet-master G.B. Balbi, was the first Italian opera to be performed publicly in France; how much of Sacrati's music remained in this version, which was only partly sung, and in the touring version given in several Italian cities from 1644, is not certain. Of Sacrati's works, only the latter version of La finta pazza is known to survive. He may have had a hand in the score of Monteverdi's L'incoronazione di Poppea (see Curtis).

Sadai [Sidi], Yizhak (b Sofia, 13 May 1935). Israeli composer of Bulgarian birth. He moved to Israel with his parents in 1949, and in 1956 graduated from the Tel-Aviv Academy under Boskovich. He also studied composition with Tal (1954) and Haubenstock-Ramati (1959) and attended the Darmstadt summer courses. He founded the electronic music studio at Tel-Aviv Univeristy (1974), and was senior lecturer at the Jerusalem and Tel-Aviv music academies as well as frequently teaching abroad; he was appointed professor at the Rubin Academy of Music at Tel-Aviv Univerisity in 1980. The works he composed between 1955 and 1959 show two forces working simultaneously: a striving to integrate maqāmāt with Bergian expressionism, and an attempt at emancipation from Eastern influences. These concerns are especially shown in the plaintive chamber cantata Ecclesiastes and in the Ricercare symphonique respectively. Newer European techniques, suggested by Haubenstock-Ramati, brought about the satiric cantata Psychoanalysis, and the expressive serial keyboard variations Impressions d'un chorale, which was performed at the 1964 ISCM Festival. Psychoanalysis has complexities of irregular rhythmic division and Klangfarbenmelodie textures. But oriental melodic shapes are still present in the somewhat simpler textures of the Biblical cantata Hatzvi Yisrael. In 1965 Sadai embarked on a post-Webern Impressionist style, beginning with Interpolations variées for string quartet and harpischord or piano, and Nuances for chamber orchestra, and continuing, for example, with the cluster-filled textures of Prelude à Jerusalem (1968). Phenomenology has played a major part in his approach to composition and analysis since he met Pierre Schaeffer in 1966. A later influence which he has claimed is that of functional structuralism and structural linguistics. Except for Nine Educational Pieces for piano (1972) and Anamorphoses for string quartet (1981–2), all of Sadai's works from 1971 on have electro-acoustic elements. Trial 19 (1979), for example, is an opera in two parts, in which the first part is entirely electro-acoutic tape; the work received its première in the Recha Freier festival 'Testimonium' in Jerusalem. In his numerous writings and papers he has discussed, among other subjects, the meanings and problems of an electro-acoustic language, aspects of music perception and musical phenomenology and epistemology.

Sadāraṅg [Khān, Niyāmat] (fl early 18th century). Indian singer. The name Sadāraṅg was a soubriquet; he was properly named Niyāmat or Na'mat Khān and perhaps originally called Khushal Khān, the son of Nirmal Khān. The names are in doubt, but one tradition held that he was descended on his father's side from the daughter of Tānsen. He trained with a variety of singers and poets at the courts of Bahadur Shah I and his successors, and became the leading and most celebrated musician at the artistically lively Delhi court of the Mughal Emperor Muhammad Shah (ruled 1719–48). Sadāraṅg has been traditionally associated with the rise, and even the invention, of the Hindustani vocal genre khayāl; an attractive but spurious story holds that he devised the form as a departure from the dhrupad and then taught his new compositions to two young Qavvāl singers. Contemporary Persian sources however show that Niyāmat Khān was one of a large number of khayāl singers in a diverse musical culture which accommodated a wide range of forms and styles. He was a noted bīn player and a singer in various styles of Hindustani music. His brother and nephew were also highly praised for their skill as instrumentalists.

Saddler, Frank (b PN, 9 Sept 1864; d Brewster, NY, 25 March 1921). American orchestrator and arranger. Little is known of his early years, although his musical training included study in Munich. By 1900 he was in New York and preparing arrangements for musical comedies and the New York Hippodrome's extravaganzas. He contributed to a few early Gershwin musicals, but is remembered principally for his steady association with Jerome Kern in his last decade, especially those productions staged at the Princess Theatre. His orchestrations for Kern include The Red Petticoat (1912), Oh, I Say (1913), Nobody Home and Very Good Eddie (both 1915), Have a Heart, Love o' Mike, Oh, Boy and Leave It to Jane (all 1917), Oh, Lady! Lady! (1918), Hitchy Koo, 1920 and The City Chap (1925).

Programme credit for orchestrators was not routine in Saddler's time, but theatre critics occasionally cited the role of his colourful and disciplined orchestrations in a new show's success. Robert Russell Bennett, who succeeded Saddler as pre-eminent in the field, praised him as 'an orchestrator, versatile and inventive, with a fine ear for every novel effect of the great writers of symphonic music and a genius for adapting their tricks to the current musical-comedy tunes. . . . It is not too much to say that he established once and for all the position of the orchestrator as a personality quite apart from the composer of the songs'. His manuscripts are held at the Library of Congress, New York Public Library and the University of Wisconsin-Madison.

Sadeler [Sadelar], Jan [Johan; Jean] (b Brussels, 1550; d Venice,1610). Flemish copperplate engraver. One of a family of engravers, he worked in several German cities, notably Munich, and in Italy. His works include a number of devotional music publications (1584–90; some ed. in Organum, 1st ser., xix–xx, Leipzig, 1930). These engravings, sometimes known as 'picture-motets', show angels or biblical figures singing and playing from partbooks and may have been published in support of the Counter-Reformation (see illustration). Their popularity is demonstrated by the fact that the earliest example, C. Verdonck's Ave gratia plena (Antwerp, 1584), was reprinted at Rome in 1586 and at Antwerp in 1587. The composers, artists and engravers were all Flemish and these fine engravings, with the music complete and legible, bear witness to the thriving artistic life in Antwerp at the end of the 16th century. Although their influence on Verovio is largely conjectural, they are important in their own right as particularly beautiful and unusual examples of early music engraving. One of the finest, Pevernage's Nata et grata polo, is found as the title-page to a volume of engravings, Encomium musices, published by Philip Galle at Antwerp about 1590.

Sádlo [Zátvrzský], Miloš (b Prague, 13 April 1912). Czech cellist. He studied the violin and taught himself the cello, but then learnt bookbinding until advised by the teacher K.P. Sádlo (whose name he adopted) to make music his career. Though he was active as a soloist from 1929 and made his débuts in Vienna in 1934 and London in 1937, he studied with Sádlo at the Prague Conservatory (1939–41) and with Casals (1955). He was a member of the Prague Quartet (1931–3), the Czech Trio (1940–56, again from 1973), the Suk Trio (1957–60) and the Prague Trio (1966–73). In 1950 he began to teach at the Prague Academy; he also gave courses in the USA and at Weimar. His splendid technique, wonderful tone and full-blooded musicality have been admired in his wide repertory of both classical and contemporary works. He gave the première of Khachaturian's concerto, Shostakovich's Second Piano Trio (with Oistrakh and Shostakovich) and the modern premières of Dvořák's A major Concerto and Haydn's C major Concerto. He played a Gagliano of 1750. He was soloist with the Czech PO from 1949 to 1953.

Sadra, I Wayan (b Denpasar, Bali, 1 Aug 1953). Indonesian composer and gamelan player. After studying classical Balinese music at the Balinese Conservatory for the Performing Arts in Denpasar, he went to Jakarta in 1973 and became acquainted with contemporary art. A highly accomplished player of the Balinese gamelan, Sadra taught the gamelan at the Jakarta Fine Arts Institute (1975–8) and Balinese music at the Indonesian University (1978–80), then moved to Surakarta to study and teach at the Indonesian Academy for the Performing Arts (1983–7). At the forefront of an emerging group of composers trained in the indigenous classical musics of particular regions of Indonesia, he has departed from his background in gamelan music. His works display his extraordinary musical imagination and his skill in employing indigenous compositional techniques and new ways of playing traditional instruments. An example of his wide range of musical expression in multi-media and performance art is Nur Goṙa Rupa (1994), a work made in collaboration with the visual artist A.F. Narsen and the choreographer Srihadi. Sadra often presents his experimental works in villages around Surakarta. His music has been performed in Europe, America and in other Asian countries.

Saegusa, Shigeaki (b Tokyo, 8 July 1942). Japanese composer. In 1962 he started to study composition with Yoshio Hasegawa at the Tokyo National University of Fine Arts and Music (MA 1972). His honours include two Japan Art Festival Awards (1974, 1981), the Japan Record Academy Award (1981) and the Japan Record Society's Golden Disc Award (1988), and for his film music the Japan Academy Film Music Award (1989). He is the director of the Japan Federation of Composers and teaches composition at the Tokyo College of Music; he is also active in the Japanese Society for Rights of Authors, Composers and Publishers and the Japanese Society of Modern Music. In 1991 he completed the unfinished portions of Mozart's Sinfonia concertante in A for violin, viola, cello and orchestra K320*e* at the request of the Mozarteum in Salzburg. He is best known for his popular neo-romantic compositions. Japanese history serves as the basis of many of his dramatic works, from the oratorio Yamato Takeru (1989) to the opera Chushingura (1997). He has also hosted Japanese TV programmes and written several books. (K. Hori, ed.: Nihon no Sakkyoku nijusseiki [Japanese compositions in the 20th century], Tokyo, 1999, pp.159–61)

JUDITH ANN HERD

Saenghwang [saeng]. Korean mouth organ. It is constructed of a bowl-shaped windchest (originally a gourd, now usually of wood or metal) with 17 slender bamboo pipes of varying length mounted into the top. One of the pipes is mute, the other 16 having free metal reeds; each pipe has a finger-hole located below the reed so that the pipe sounds only when the hole is closed. A short, stubby mouthpiece with a square opening leads into the windchest. The pipes sound on both inhaling and exhaling, and in current usage up to three are sounded simultaneously. Adjustable slits at the tops of the pipes allow for tuning. The range of the instrument is e♭′–c‴.

Saenghwang (mouth organ) of Korea, as depicted in 'Akhak kwebŏm' ('Guide to the Study of Music'), 1493

According to Chinese sources the mouth organ was played in Korea during the Paekche dynasty (18 BCE–663 CE), and such an instrument appears in relief on a bronze bell cast in 725 CE and in a stone carving of roughly the same period. Among the large gifts of instruments in 1114 and 1116 from the Song Chinese emperor to Korea were 90 mouth organs, but since they were made of gourd they eventually rotted. By the 15th century the Koreans were making their own mouth organs on the model of two instruments bestowed by the Ming Chinese emperor in 1406.

Mouth organs were prescribed by the treatise Akhak kwebŏm (1493) for aak ('ritual music'), tangak ('Chinese music') and hyangak ('native music'). The treatise distinguishes three types, based on research into Chinese theoretical sources: the hwa (Chin.: he), a small instrument (34.7 cm high) with 13 pipes (one mute); the saeng (Chin.: sheng), a medium-sized instrument (44.4 cm) with 17 pipes (one mute; see illustration); and the u (Chin.: yu), a large instrument (55.9 cm) with 17 pipes (one mute), pitched an octave lower than the saeng.

The present day repertory for saenghwang is very limited, although a favourite duet, Suryongŭm, pairs it with the notched flute TANSO.

ROBERT C. PROVINE

Sáenz (Amadeo), Pedro (Alejo) (b Buenos Aires, 4 May 1915; d Madrid, 16 Feb 1995). Argentine and (after 1985) Spanish composer. He studied in Buenos Aires with Alberto Williams and Celestino Piaggio at the Williams Conservatory (1924–9, 1931–5) and with José André (composition), Athos Palma (theory) and Jorge de Lalewicz (piano) at the National Conservatory (1936–9). He undertook postgraduate studies in Paris with Honegger, Milhaud and Rivier (1948–50). He was professor of counterpoint at the National Conservatory in Buenos Aires (1944–63), director of the Municipal Conservatory (1955–63) and professor of counterpoint and morphology at the faculty of arts and musical sciences of the Catholic University of Argentina (1963–5; dean, 1964–5). In 1973, for both artistic and political reasons, he settled in Madrid. There, in about 1975, he began to prepare a performing version of the earliest preserved Spanish opera, Juan Hidalgo's Celos aun del aire matan (1660), which was produced by the WDR in Cologne on 9 October 1981.

Sáenz's music employs a wide diversity of styles, and shows a preference for short form and variation technique. It ranges from tonal works, some referring to the 18th century (Preludio en fa), to those inspired by folk music (Aquel Buenos Aires), 12-note and non-tonal music (Policromías) and music based on a nine-note chord and its subsets (G♯–B–D–E–G–B♭–C–E♭–F♯; Sonata sobre un acorde). Other pieces, such as Variaciones y fuga sobre un tema de Beethoven, occupy a position midway between tonality and atonality. In the last decade of his life he also employed what he termed a 'neo-baroque' style, based on parallel minor chords a 3rd apart (Dos elegías y epílogo).

JUAN MARIA SOLARE

Saeta (Sp.: 'arrow', 'spontaneous outburst'; Lat. sagitta: 'arrow', 'dart'). A devotional song genre, considered to be the religious song par excellence of Andalusia, as well as a venerable constituent of CANTE HONDO (deep song). The saeta has long been associated with Holy Week, particularly in Seville, where it achieved widespread fame, and where it continues to be sung along the extended route of the all-night street processions in an atmosphere of fervour and vitality, intermixed with deep reverence and joy. The pasos (statue-bearing floats), toward which the saetas are directed and which are carried by the various cofradías (brotherhoods), constitute an important element of the processions. Saetas can also be heard during the processions of Corpus Christi, and are quite popular in all the regions of Spain. In as much as the pasos depict scenes from the Passion, the saetas, whose coplas (stanzas) range from four to six octosyllabic hemistichs (perhaps derived from the ancient romances), deal with themes from the Passion, the death of Christ and the sorrows of the Virgin.

According to López Fernández, the saeta evolved into three distinct types: the primitive saetas narrativas, which narrated the Passion and Death of Christ; saetas explicativas, which described the pasos carried by the various cofradías along the procession route; and saetas afectivas, which, by the mid-19th century, were sung spontaneously by individual interpreters at different points along the procession route, on the street or from a balcony or window, during which time the procession was halted. Saetas afectivas are directed toward a particular paso, expressing the subjective thoughts, emotions and prayers of the singer.

The origin of the saeta, like many other genres of cante jondo, is uncertain. López Fernández sought its antecedents in Moorish and Jewish chants which, when later intermingled with plainchant, were called saeta penetrantes and saetas del pecado mortal. Larrea Palacín surmised that the saeta, as a musical form, was derived from a remote fertility rite involving blood sacrifice which, when later christianized, lost its earlier sacrificial aspect in the course of centuries. Caffarena suggested that the saeta originated from the liturgical music of the early Christians and that it was later gypsified (aflamencada), perhaps like the toná, martinete or the siguiriya. The more embellished and animated gypsified style resulted in the distinction between the ancient (more pristine and psalm-like) and modern renditions of the saeta. Likewise Rossy distinguished between the ancient and classic saeta, which was still popular during the first quarter of the 20th century, and the modern saetas, sung as saetas por fandangos, por martinetes, por siguiriyas etc. Kahn linked it to the sung prayers of the Jewish converts. Caballero Bonald and others have expressed the widely accepted hypothesis that the saeta was derived from the toná, being a corruption of Catholic liturgical psalmodies, and that saetas were first sung only at the end of the 18th century.

ISRAEL J. KATZ

Saeverud, Harald (Sigurd Johan) (b Bergen, 17 April 1897; d Bergen, 27 March 1992). Norwegian composer. He studied the piano and theory at the Bergen Conservatory (1915–19) with Borghild Holmsen, then composition at the Berlin Hochschule für Musik (1920–22) with Friedrich E. Koch. He was a member of the executive committee of the Norwegian Composers' Association (1946–8) and of its expert council (1946–54, 1961–2). Probably Norway's most prolific composer after Grieg, he received a number of Norwegian and foreign distinctions during his career, and at his death he was granted a state funeral. His son is the composer Ketil Hvoslef.

His first three symphonies (1920, 1923 and 1926) are intense and late Romantic. His musical language moved towards atonality in the Piano Suite (1931), but generally in the 1930s he turned to a more simplified expression, close to neo-classicism, at this time he became partial to using variation technique. He wrote some of his most important works in protest against the German invasion of 1940: Kjempeviseslåtten ('The Ballade of Revolt'), and his fifth, sixth and seventh symphonies ('Quasi una fantasia', 'Sinfonia dolorosa' and 'Salme' respectively). His music became characterized by the melody as leading element (melodic transformation is also evident), a strong rhythm and a tendency towards polyphony; his works were freely tonal, with colourful and often unconventional orchestration. His more significant works after the war include his stage music for Ibsen's Peer Gynt (1947), which has gained great popularity. Important also are his concertos for piano (1948–50), for violin (1956) and for bassoon (1963, rev. 1985–7), and his last two symphonies: no.8 ('Minnesota-Symphony', 1958) and no.9 (1965), in which symphonic writing is combined with a stronger programmatic content. In the 1970s he showed an increased interest in chamber music.

Although primarily a symphonic composer, Saeverud also made a great contribution to the Norwegian piano repertory. He had moved to the outskirts of Bergen in 1939 and his closer connections with nature resulted in the great number of piano pieces Slåtter og stev fra Siljustøl ('Tunes and Dances from Siljustøl'), many of which are small tone pictures inspired by nature and indirectly influenced by Norwegian folksongs. Saeverud did not, with some minor exceptions, use Norwegian folk music directly, but he was strongly influenced by the essence of folksongs and fiddle dances, especially those from Hardanger, where he had strong family roots.

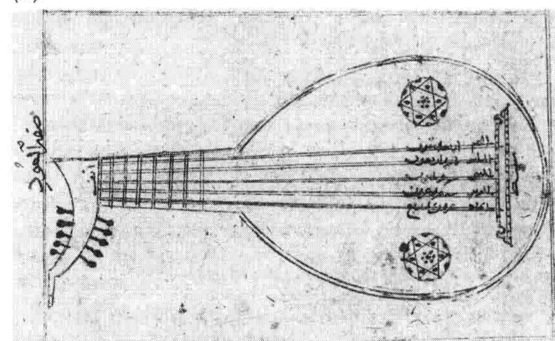
LORENTZ REITAN

Ṣafī al-Dīn [al-Urmawī] (d Baghdad, 1294). Theorist, performer and composer, possibly of Azeri origin. He was a prominent court musician under the last Abbasid caliph, al-Musta'sim (1242–58), although he first attracted attention for his skill as a calligrapher. Surviving the sack of Baghdad in 1258, he entered the service of the Mongol Il-Khans and became attached to the powerful Juwaynī family, but after their fall (1286) he lost favour, and died imprisoned for debt.



Ṣafī al-Dīn is one of the most important figures in the history of music theory in the Islamic Middle East, and the first great theorist since IBN SĪNĀ (980–1037) and IBN ZAYLA (d 1048) whose works are extant. His two treatises on music, the Kitāb al-adwār ('Book of cycles') and the later and fuller Risāla al-sharafiyya ('The Sharafian treatise'), present a synthesis of elements found in the earlier theoretical tradition which dominated the thinking of all the more important theorists of the following two centuries.

His most significant and influential contribution was a scale system derived from a tetrachord division given by AL-FĀRĀBĪ as a fretting on the ṭunbūr khurāsānī (long-necked lute). This scale system integrated the 'irrational' neutral intervals found in practice (and previously defined empirically on the lute) within a rigidly symmetrical extension of the Pythagorean scale, thereby enabling them to be approximated to just-intonation intervals. It divided the octave into 17 intervals: the octave into two tetrachords and a whole tone (above); the tetrachords into two whole tones and a limma (above); and the whole tones into two limmas and a comma (above). This constitutes essentially an elegant solution to an analytical problem, and its relationship to the intervallic intonational norms found in practice is in some respects oblique. Nevertheless, the use Ṣafī al-Dīn made of this system to provide information about the intervallic outlines of the most important modes is of inestimable value. His account is much fuller than that of Ibn Sīnā, and affords the earliest opportunity to examine the modal system (or at least the scale structures) of Islamic art music in any detail. Ṣafī al-Dīn supplied a complete list of the two main sets of modes – the 12 shudūd and the six āwāzāt – and noted two further modes derived from two of the shudūd. Wherever possible they are presented in terms of a standard octave scale structure, with the occasional distortion notwithstanding.

Ṣafī al-Dīn ignored some of the general topics dealt with by both earlier and later theorists, and his range is thus rather narrow. He said nothing about form, for example, and despite being credited with the invention of the nuzha (a rectangular psaltery; fig.1*a*) and the mughnī (a kind of archlute; fig.1*b*) he failed to include any discussion of instruments. The omission is obviously deliberate since he deleted from the Kitāb al-adwār a section on the tuning of the qānūn (psaltery) and jank (harp) which had been included in an early draft. Such material was evidently tangential to his primary theoretical concerns.

Ṣafī al-Dīn's instructive, if all too brief, examples of notation afford some slight insight into features of melodic articulation. However, they are designed less to record representative compositions than to exemplify the technique of notation. His system uses letters (in a sequence which allots them numerical values) for pitch and numerals for duration, and thus also gives some indication of rhythmic structure.

His general treatment of rhythm, while perhaps not as original as his treatment of scale, is also innovative, and was to prove equally influential. He used the syllabic definitions derived from earlier theoretical analyses (and ultimately from prosody) to describe the dimensions and internal accentual patterns of the various rhythmic cycles in common use. In addition to the written theory, he introduced a visual display of this information, using a circular format.

Ṣafī al-Dīn was also highly regarded as a composer. One of his songs was notated by the encyclopedist QUTB AL-DĪN (for a transcription of the beginnning see ARAB MUSIC, §I, 4(i)(ii), ex.7). His compositions, many in the cyclical nawba form, were widely disseminated by his pupils and his enduring fame is attested by the number of compositions attributed to him in surviving song text collections of the 15th and 16th centuries. discussion of Ṣafī al-Dīn in historical context see ARAB MUSIC, §I, 4(i)(ii); IRAN, §II, 1.

Safonov, Vasily Il'ich (b Cossack settlement, nr Itsyursk, Terek, Caucasus, 25 Jan/6 Feb 1852; d Kislovodsk, Caucasus, 14/27 Feb 1918). Russian conductor, pianist and teacher. His father was a Cossack general who left the Caucasus in 1862 to settle in St Petersburg, where his son attended the Alexander Lyceum and took piano lessons with Leschetizky. Safonov entered the civil service in 1872, but resigned in 1879 to enrol in Zaremba's theory class and Brassin's piano class at the St Petersburg Conservatory. He made excellent progress, and graduated in 1880 with a gold medal. In the same year he made his début as a pianist at one of the concerts of the Russian Musical Society. He then embarked on a concert tour with the cellist Karl Davïdov, travelling extensively throughout western Europe.

Safonov taught at the St Petersburg Conservatory until 1885 when, through the good offices of Tchaikovsky, he became a professor of piano at the conservatory in Moscow. He devoted himself to his new duties with great enthusiasm, and in 1889 he was appointed to the directorship of the conservatory in succession to S.I. Taneyev, again at Tchaikovsky's instigation. (His students gave him the nickname 'The Eagle of the Caucasus'.) During his time in office sufficient money was raised to enable the conservatory to move into new buildings (his wife was a daughter of the Minister of Finance) and, thanks to his energetic concern, the standard of teaching improved considerably. He placed particular emphasis on the study of composition, though his own reputation as a pianist drew piano students of calibre to the conservatory. But his relationship with Tchaikovsky, who was on the board that governed the conservatory, was not always smooth, especially when Safonov refused to appoint Tchaikovsky's nominees to his staff. His political convictions tended towards the conservative, and he felt obliged to resign after the period of student unrest in 1905.

From 1889 to 1905, and again from 1909 to 1911, he was principal conductor of the Moscow branch of the Russian Musical Society; he also organized several seasons of popular concerts in Moscow. Rimsky-Korsakov much admired his conducting, and Glazunov considered him to be the finest Russian conductor of his time. In his later years he conducted without a baton. He prophesied that, within a few years, all conductors would dispense with their batons; his example was not widely followed, though the novelty of the 'batonless conductor' was much enjoyed by audiences and critics in Russia and elsewhere. He made occasional appearances with foreign orchestras and, after being invited to New York as guest conductor of the Philharmonic Society Orchestra in 1904, he returned to become its sole conductor from 1906 to 1909. At the same time he was appointed director of the National Conservatory of Music in New York. In 1906 he conducted the LSO in a series of concerts, and in 1909 he appeared at the Newcastle Festival. His thoughtful and sensitive approach to music, and his tactful but firm handling of the orchestra were much admired. An American critic commented that 'Russia lost a great general when Safonov became a conductor!' He introduced the music of his Russian contemporaries to European and American audiences, conducting the first foreign performances of works by Tchaikovsky, Glazunov, Skryabin and Rachmaninoff.

On his return to Russia in 1909 he resumed his concert work and also played in chamber ensembles. He was an outstanding solo pianist whose interpretative ability and technical control were frequently commended. He was interested in the physiological and psychological aspects of piano playing, and was much sought after as a teacher; his pupils included Skryabin and Medtner. He wrote a book on piano technique, Novaya formula (Moscow, 1916; Eng. trans., 1916).

Sagayev, Dimitar (b Plovdiv, 27 Feb 1915). Bulgarian composer. The son of the writer Konstantin Sagayev, he first studied the piano with Asen Dimitrov and Dimiter Nenov before entering the State Academy of Music. There, he studied composition with Stoyanov and Vladigerov, and the piano with Panka Pelishek and Tamara Yankova. He graduated in 1940 after which he worked variously as music teacher, bandmaster, director of art music for Bulgarian Radio and as director of the music department of the ministry of culture. In 1948 he was appointed to teach at the State Academy of Music; he subsequently served as dean of the theory faculty, deputy rector, director of the chair for music theory and professor of orchestration. His compositional style draws on Bulgarian history and musical traditions. While his earlier works demonstrate a fascination with the intonational peculiarities of folk music, he later turned for inspiration to ancient Orthodox chant and the melodies of Ioan Kukuzel in particular. Although he never sought innovation as an end in itself, his solutions to the various problems he set himself are indeed unusual. His accessible and emotionally direct music – often noted for its colourful instrumentation – is often linked to historical imagery.

ANDA PALIEVA

Sagbut. Early English name for TROMBONE.

Sage [Sadze], Christian [Christianus] (b 1410; d 1490). South Netherlandish theorist. He was a monk at the Benedictine abbey of St Andrew's, Bruges, and wrote the Tractatus modi, temporis et prolationis (*c*1470, pr. in CoussemakerS, iii, 264) which survives in I-Bc B/2 together with treatises by Tinctoris. The first part of the treatise describes the five intervallic proportions in simple Boethian terms. This is followed by an equally elementary commentary on the first section of Johannes de Muris's Libellus cantus mensurabilis (CoussemakerS, iii, 46). Sage explained the various levels of mensuration (modus, tempus and prolatio) making use of charts which show pictorially the divisions of maxima, longa, brevis and semibrevis. He only included signs for tempus and prolatio.

Saghyrbayev, Kurmangazy (b Zhideli [now Zhangaly], 1818; d 1889). Kazakh dömbra player, singer and composer of kyui. He belonged to the Bukeev horde. He was interested in music from his early childhood and his first teacher was Ozaq, a dömbra player of the tradition of western Kazakhstan. At the age of 18 Saghyrbayev became a professional musician; he travelled in Kazakhstan and met many celebrated musicians. One of his first kyui, Kishkentai, was written in response to the activities of the people's liberation movement in western Kazakhstan under the leadership of Isatai Taimanov and Makhambet Utemisov (1836–7). Saghyrbayev was imprisoned by the Tsarist government in 1857 because of his rebellious nature. After his escape he was sent to Orenburg prison again, but according to legend he was released after giving a remarkable performance on the dömbra. During this period he composed several kyui including Qayran sheshem ('Oh, my Poor Mother') and Türmeden qashqan ('The Escape from Jail'). His most famous kyui is Saryarka ('Golden Steppe'); the composer Yevgeny Brusilovsky wrote a symphonic suite with the same title based on Saghyrbayev's work. During a meeting with the kyui singer Dauletkerei Shigayev, Saghyrbayev created the kyui Bulbul ('Nightingale') and Zhiger ('Strive' or 'Energy'), which became widely popular. His innovations included an extensive use of parallel 2nds and 3rds and the development of dömbra kyui playing techniques, in particular the tentek qagys stroke (a sweeping movement of the right hand). He spent the last years of his life on the shores of the Caspian Sea; one of his most outstanding apprentices during this period was Dina Nurpeisova (1861–1955). In honour of Saghyrbayev's work, the Kazakh State Conservatory and the State Orchestra in Almaty were named after him.

Sagreras, Julio S. (b Buenos Aires, 22 Nov 1879; d Buenos Aires, 20 July 1942). Argentine guitarist and composer. He began music studies with his father, Gaspar Sagreras, and with Carlos Marchal, later graduating from the Academy of Fine Arts of Buenos Aires, where he was subsequently appointed professor of guitar and solfeggio. He was a founder and first president of the Asociación Guitarrística Argentina. His most important contributions were in the area of guitar pedagogy, and he produced a six-volume set of Lecciones which are still in use today, as is his Técnica superior de guitarra (a compendium of exercises). Several of his virtuoso showpieces, such as El colibrí (The Humming-Bird), are war-horses in the guitar repertory. In all he wrote over 200 compositions for the guitar, most of them inspired by popular songs and dances such as the tango, zamba, waltz and vidala.

Saguer, Louis (b Charlottenburg, 26 March 1907; d Paris, 1 March 1991). French composer of German birth. Of Italian parentage, he first studied the piano and composition in Venice with two pupils of Busoni. In 1929 he moved to Paris, where he studied orchestration with Louis Aubert and took advice on composition from Honegger and Milhaud. He returned briefly to Berlin to follow a course of study with Hindemith and was an assistant to Eisler. He finally settled in Paris in 1933, where he engaged in concert activities as a pianist and harpsichordist. Many of his performances of contemporary music were broadcast on French, German and Belgian radio. Radio was a particular interest: between 1945 and 1971 he contributed 14 'illustrations musicales' to French Radio, which also commissioned four works, including Sine nomine and the opera Lili Merveille. Later, Saguer was appointed an inspector for SACEM. His most notable awards include the Grand Prix de Monaco (1964) for the opera Mariana Pinéda, the first prize of the American Association of Negro Music (1973) for a series of melodies on texts by Langston Hughes and the Prix de la SACEM (1974).

Saguer fused modal, polytonal and, above all, atonal languages. Often he selected a series of intervals to serve as a generative cell for the work. His fascination with complex rhythm is particularly evident in his works involving percussion: the orchestra of the Première Suite Symphonique (1931) makes use of two percussionists covering 12 instruments and in Sine nomine (1971) four percussionists manipulate the timbres of 49 instruments. ANDREA MUSK

Sahab, Salim (b Jaffa, 3 July 1941). Palestinian/Lebanese conductor of Arab classical music. From 1961 to 1965 he studied the theory of western classical music at the National Conservatory of Music in Beirut. In 1965 he moved to Moscow and studied there until 1976; he graduated first from the Gnesin Academy of Music as a choral conductor and subsequently studied symphony and opera conducting with Ginsberg, Kitaienko and Rozhdestvensky at the Tchaikovsky State Conservatory, gaining the Master of Fine Arts in 1976. He was a professor of music at the Conservatory from 1976 to 1977, after which he returned to Lebanon and turned his attention to Arab music, establishing the Beirut Ensemble for Arabic Music in 1980. In 1988 he was appointed professor at the Higher Institute for Arabic Music in Cairo, and in the following year he co-founded the Arab National Ensemble for Music at the Cairo Opera House. As a musical director and conductor he has worked with both adults and children, dedicating himself to the preservation and promotion of classical Arab music through weekly concerts; he has collaborated with distinguished performers including Fayrūz and Wadī'al-Sāfī.

Sahl, Michael (b Boston, 2 Sept 1934). American composer. He studied at Amherst College (BA 1955) and Princeton University (MFA 1957), where his teachers included Sessions and Babbitt. He also worked with Foss, Dallapiccola and Copland, among others. After a year as a creative associate at SUNY, Buffalo (1965), he served as pianist and music director for Judy Collins (1968–9). He went on to work at WBAI-FM, New York, a non-commercial radio station, becoming its music director in 1972.

After beginning serious musical training in 1942, Sahl found his ideal teacher in Citkowitz, with whom he began to study in 1947. Of Citkowitz's influences on the young musician, one of the most important was a love and respect for American popular music. During this time, Sahl started to play the banjo and became increasingly involved with folk music and the blues, also exploring jazz and American popular vocal standards. His academic training at Princeton, however, centred on 12-note and serial techniques. While on a Fulbright Fellowship to Europe (1957–8), he tried to compose in a Modernist style, but his inclination to write tonal melodies was too strong for him to become a major figure in that movement.

In 1963 Sahl returned to the USA ready to become active in folk-rock music circles. Using his background in commercial music, he began to write, compose and direct musical theatre works. These compositions, which predominately stress social issues, are written in an eclectic musical style dominated by the hybridization of Romanticism, jazz and rock. Noah (1978), a morality play based on the biblical story, reveals a facile idiom, ranging from Baroque arias to jazz and rock; several numbers, especially those cast in a pop idiom, show the influence of Berg and Weill. In 1980 Sahl received the Italia prize for his musical theatre work Civilization and its Discontents, written in collaboration with Eric Salzman; their earlier book is entitled Making Changes: a Practical Guide to Vernacular Harmony (New York, 1977).

Śahnāī [shahnāī, shehnāī]. Conical shawm of North India. It is historically linked to an aerophone which entered South Asia as a member of the Central Asian naubat ensemble. It is approximately 50 cm long and its medium-sized double reed, of cane, is fashioned from a hollow cylindrical section by constricting one end and pressing the opposite end into a flat ovoid opening; the reed is mounted on a conical metal staple. The staple, wrapped with string to ensure an airtight fit, is inserted into a wooden resonator containing seven equidistant finger-holes; there is no thumb-hole. A moderately flared brass bell is attached to the distal end of the resonator. Several reeds and a protective guard, which keeps the reeds pressed into their proper shape when not in use, plus a few staples and a metal mandrel, are strung together and can be seen dangling in front of the musician during performance. A lip disc – present but by no means ubiquitous in Indian local traditions – whereby the reed is fully inserted into the oral cavity of the performer is not used by musicians who perform within the Hindustani tradition. The lips are here in direct contact with the reed.

Performing technique over the two-octave range of the Hindustani śahnāī depends on the satisfactory interplay of several factors: breath support; tongue movement without touching the reed (used for certain types of ornamentation); tonguing the reed; embouchure control; and fingering technique. The fleshy part of the finger (often of the second phalanx), not the tip, covers the appropriate finger-hole, with the proximal hand (either right or left) using three fingers and the distal four. When the fingers are gently rocked to open and close the finger-holes the performer is able subtly to shade the pitch, and also to produce extended glissandos which, together with intricately tongued phrases are characteristic of the instrument. Other characteristics include the rich timbre, considered to be auspicious, and the instrument's ability to play sustained notes. The śahnāī is sometimes accompanied by the sur, a drone shawm which is essentially a śahnāī without tuning holes. More commonly the sur is provided by a surpeṭī (drone box), in which bellows activate free reeds to provide a drone of multiple pitches. A similar drone produced electronically is used by some śahnāī ensembles.

Although certain local examples, found mainly in Uttar Pradesh, conform to the śahnāī as described above, others contain a resonator with an integral wooden bell. The finger-holes on folk instruments may range from six to eight in number, and some but not all have a thumb-hole.

Sailer [Seyler], Leonhard (b Ulm, 4 Nov 1656; d ?Basle, after 1695). German composer and organist. He may have studied with the Ulm Cathedral organist S.A. Scherer. He became composer and organist to Margrave Friedrich Magnus of Baden-Durlach. In 1689 he accompanied the margrave into exile at Basle where he also became involved with the collegium musicum. His only printed collection of music is Cantiones sacrae (Basle, 1696), which contains 16 motets and cantatas for one to four voices with organ and either two violins or, in five pieces, viols. Most begin with a sinfonia or sonata, no.2 has a ritornello used twice, no.6 has echo effects, and in no.13, Das neugeborne Kindelein – the only one to a German text – the chorale melody Vom Himmel hoch is used and a violin motif in the sinfonia reappears in the first three verses. The pieces are not unlike certain works by Buxtehude. There are three other comparable works by Sailer in the Staatsbibliothek, Berlin: Vertere in luctum cithara, for tenor, three obbligato instruments and organ (the end of which is marked ppp), Jesu, liebster Schatz, for four voices, four instruments and organ, and O benignissime Jesu, for bass solo, two violins and organ: two others (in D-W and GB-Och respectively) are doubtful.

HORACE FISHBACK

Sailer, Sebastian [Johann Valentin] (b Weissenhorn, 12 Feb 1714; d Ober Marchtal, 7 March 1777). Swabian poet and writer of Singspiel texts. He was the son of Johann Sailer, clerk to Count Fugger, and entered the Premonstratensian monastery at Ober Marchtal. After completing his studies he was ordained and immediately became professor of canonic studies there. He was subsequently pastor at the abbey's parishes of Reutlingendorf (1748–9, 1754–7) and Dieterskirch (1757–73). The humour of his sermons carried his fame beyond the borders of Swabia into Franconia, Bavaria, Moravia and Switzerland. After preaching at the court church in Vienna in 1767 he was honoured by the Empress Maria Theresa.

In addition to his sermons, addresses and poems, some of them published in his lifetime, Sailer wrote the texts for a number of religious Singspiele, of which Die Schöpfung des ersten Menschen, der Sündenfall und dessen Strafe (Schussenried, 10 November 1743) became famous. They were not printed until 1819, however, when they appeared in an edition by Sixt Bachmann. Sailer may also have composed music to these works: in the preface Bachmann, who had known Sailer at Ober Marchtal, recounted that Sailer used to perform his Swabian plays on his own, accompanying himself with a fiddle in the airs, which he sang 'after his own composition'. Lach (1916) maintained that the earliest, rather amateurish manuscript copy of Die Schöpfung (in Latin translation, D-KA 777) was probably Sailer's, but was later carefully rewritten by a professional musician (A-Wn Cod. Suppl.mus.211). The work was also published with music in 1783 as Adams und Evens Erschaffung ... aus dem Schwäbischen ins Österreichische versetzt, and under this title was set by the Benedictine father Meingosus Gaelle in 1796.

EBERHARD STIEFEL

Sainct-Gelays, Mellin de. See SAINT-GELAIS, MELLIN DE.

Sainete (Sp.: 'farce', 'titbit'; Fr. saynète). A short Spanish theatrical piece, initially equivalent to the entremés (intermezzo), a little play between acts. It came to be called sainete when it was intended for performance after the main play rather than in the middle of it. In the 17th century the sainete was usually spoken, but could also include one or two musical numbers. In the 18th century musical numbers came to be deemed essential. Since most extant sainetes belong to the second half of the 18th century (some 500 were given in Madrid alone during that period), their musical numbers are mostly seguidillas, but there are also choruses, quartets, minuets, jotas, fandangos, French- and Italian-style songs, marches and even short instrumental pieces, especially overtures. Many late 18th-century sainetes were written by the composers of the main tonadillas or zarzuelas, from Luis Misón to Blas de Laserna, and were comic and popular in character.

In the 19th century the sainete lost its hold on the stage, but when after 1870 the género chico type of zarzuela developed, many composers called their pieces sainete or its diminutive sainetillo. Tomás Bretón's La verbena de la paloma (1894) and Ruperto Chapí's La revoltosa (1897) were published as sainetes, but during the period such terms had no specific significance. In the late 19th century the words sainete and sainetillo were also used to describe short, farcical theatrical pieces without music. In France Hervé and Planquette wrote lightweight saynètes, and Massenet described Bérangère et Anatole as a sainete.

ROGER ALIER

Sainne. See SAYVE family.

Sainne [Sayne], Lambert de (b Rouen, *c*1500; d after 1563). French composer. He was a chorister at Rouen Cathedral, where his father, Rodolphe de Sainne, was organist from 1499 until 1514. He later sang in the choir of the imperial chapel at Vienna, and according to Fétis he was still there when Ferdinand I died in 1564.

Two motets by Sainne survive (in RISM $1568^4$): a four-part work, Herodes rex iratus with the expressive sequel Vox in rama, and a five-part work, Hic est Martinus, the conclusion of whose second section effectively repeats the closing text and music of the first. There is another five-part motet, Ecce sacerdos magnus, less distinctive thematically than the others, in RISM $1568^5$.

The slightly emended spelling in the attribution of Hic est Martinus in the quintus partbook to 'Lambert de Saievve' encourages further confusion between Sainne and the later 16th-century composer Lambert de Sayve.

RICHARD MARLOW

Sainsbury, John Davis (b Bermondsey, *c*1793; d *c*1862). English literary agent. He was the eldest son of a London merchant, John Saintsbury. In about 1816 he set up as a coal merchant in Smithfield, and from 1823 to 1829 he operated as a 'literary, clerical and scholastic agent, and book and music seller' at Salisbury Square, Fleet Street, where he undertook private book production for aspiring authors. Of the three titles his agency produced, only A Dictionary of Musicians from the Earliest Ages to the Present Time, brought out under the Longman imprint in 1824, had lasting value. It was the first international dictionary of musicians in English, and remains the source of information on some British subjects in the Dictionary of National Biography and in this dictionary.

Essentially a compilation from earlier reference works and histories, including those of Choron and Fayolle, Gerber, Burney, Hawkins and William Bingley (Musical Biography, 1814, the most heavily used English source), and from journals such as the Harmonicon and Quarterly Musical Magazine and Review, the two-volume Dictionary nevertheless contains original material supplied by musicians to whom Sainsbury wrote directly; many of their replies, together with other editorial files, survive to reveal the tactics of early vanity publishing (GB-Gu, Euing Collection). Sainsbury's purpose and methods were suspect even in his own day, and the book's balance and factual content are in places absurd. Scholarly concern was renewed in 1931 when, after his discovery of the letters in Glasgow, H.G. Farmer showed Sainsbury's avowed musical patriotism to be specious, hinting at commercial motives instead. Still, for the rich detail and social vivacity in some of its original memoirs, the dictionary remains useful. Its further significance lies in its connection with the founding of the Royal Academy of Music in 1822–3.

The Glasgow files, the minute-book of the early RAM Committee and Sainsbury's other activities (he was primarily a collector of Napoleonic manuscripts) strongly suggest that the dictionary was instigated by N.C. Bochsa, the French harpist and administrator of the RAM, who was eager not only to promote the goals of the academy generally, but also to use the book as a magnet in music sellers' shops to attract RAM subscribers. It was Bochsa who translated Choron's Dictionnaire historique for Sainsbury. The dictionary had a limited sale; its apparent reissue in 1825, required by a settlement over a plagiarism charge, merely appended advertising matter to unsold copies of the original print run, and the so-called second edition of 1827 was nothing more than further leftovers issued with a new title-page and preface.

St Albans International Organ Festival. Biennial festival founded in 1963 by PETER HURFORD.

Saint-Amans [Saint-Aman, Saint-Amand, Saint-Amant], Louis Joseph (Claude) (b Marseilles, 26 June 1749; d Paris, *c*1820). French composer. He abandoned law studies to travel around southern France with an Italian troupe performing opere buffe, and then spent three years in Italy as tutor to the children of a Swiss baron. Having studied the music of several Italian composers, he decided to pursue a career as an opera composer in Paris, arriving in 1769 and making his début the following year with the opéra comique Dom Alvar et Mincia. As neither this, nor two other works for the Comédie-Italienne, was particularly successful, Saint-Amans turned to the Opéra and composed a number of ballets and tragédies. Most of these remained unperformed, although he was invited to write French recitative and ballets for Sacchini's L'olympiade (1777). He moved to Brussels in 1778 and, during a six-year period as conductor of the Théâtre de la Monnaie, composed further works that were well received. After returning to Paris he was appointed professor of singing at the Ecole Royale de Chant (later the Conservatoire). He continued to write opéras comiques until the early years of the 19th century, but lack of critical acclaim and a move to Brest (following the loss of his position at the Conservatoire) may have led him to abandon composing for the stage during his last 15 years. Saint-Amans also composed several religious works – motets, oratorios and a Te Deum for Napoleon's birthday celebrations in 1807 – in addition to a modest number of instrumental works, although few of these are inspired in character or design.

The span of Saint-Amans' career coincides exactly with that of the leading opéra comique composer of the period, Grétry. That Saint-Amans was overshadowed by more successful contemporaries is evident from reviews criticizing the lack of melodic invention and harmonic design in his music, although Burney commented favourably on the overture to Dom Alvar et Mincia. His reworking of operas by earlier composers – Le poirier (Vadé), Ninette à la cour and La fée Urgèle (Duni) – met with greater success, but the charming simplicity of such works had, by the late 18th century, become distinctly outmoded.

Saint-Cyr. Village west of Versailles where in 1686 Mme de Maintenon established the Maison Royale St-Louis de Saint-Cyr; see PARIS, §V, 3.

St Denis. Benedictine monastery north of Paris. It was the burial-place of the French kings, and the first abbey to display elements of Gothic architecture. Over the centuries, St Denis forged a ritual, based on an embroidered history of the saint for whom it is named, that reflected both the royalist politics of the monks and the particular needs of the successive church buildings.

1. History and liturgical development. 2. Sources. 3. Music. 4. Theorists.

1. HISTORY AND LITURGICAL DEVELOPMENT. St Denis (Sanctus Dionysius) was a 3rd-century missionary, sent from Rome to serve as first bishop of Paris and martyred in the city in about 250. A basilica built over his tomb to the north of Paris in about 475 housed the first pre-monastic establishment. Merovingian kings adopted St Denis as their patron early on, and in the Carolingian era, King Louis the Pious asked Abbot Hilduin (814–41) to write an official life of the saint. The primary source on St Denis was the 6th-century account of Gregory of Tours, but Hilduin drew on other works instead. Among these were the writings of Pseudo-Dionysius, the 5th-century Syrian author of four Neoplatonic metaphysical treatises in Greek (ed. and trans. C. Luibheid and P. Rorem, Mahwah, NJ, 1987) who had taken the name of the Pauline disciple Dionysius the Areopagite (see Acts xvii.22–34) to enhance his image. Hilduin's conflation of the Pseudo-Dionysius/Dionysius the Areopagite figure with the 3rd-century apostle to Gaul, created a new, tripartite personnage who appealed to the French not only as the bishop and martyr he actually was, but also as a major thinker and follower of St Paul in Athens.

Hilduin's forgery left numerous imprints on the liturgy of St Denis, for example, in the Greek Mass that the monks established under Abbot Guillaume de Gap (1172–86). Celebrated on the octave of the saint (16 October) until the French Revolution, this service reinforced the Pseudo-Dionysian portion of the saint's persona through its use of Greek texts and, in some cases, music. This Greek Mass differed from the one sung in many Western churches, in which only the Ordinary was chanted in Greek on Pentecost (Atkinson), for at St Denis both Ordinary and Proper items were translated into Greek (using Latin letters). One of the more interesting chants in the ceremony was the Cheroubikon, or hymn of the cherubim, which was derived from the Byzantine rite to replace the offertory at St Denis. The text of this piece is laced with Pseudo-Dionysian symbolism in its references to the Trinity, the cherubim, and the angelic orders. At least seven Western sources for the Cheroubikon have survived, and vestiges of other parts of the ritual are preserved in ten manuscripts from the abbey (Robertson, 1991, pp.285–98).

In other ways, too, the interaction of music and ceremony with the political aspirations of the monks is evident at St Denis. Twice during the Merovingian period the congregation prominently exhibited their devotion to the royal house through the practice of perpetual psalmody (laus perennis), a ritual in which shifts of monks sang psalms continually between each of the Offices so that unceasing praise filled the abbey. The first royal patron of St Denis, King Dagobert (d 639), instituted this rite, and his son Clovis II renewed it in 654; both attempts were short-lived. St Denis again entered the limelight in the mid-8th century, when Pope Stephen II sojourned in the abbey in the winter of 754. Personnel from the Roman Schola Cantorum accompanied the pope on this visit, and demonstrations of the Roman liturgy and its chant, which Charlemagne (764–814) subsequently tried to promote throughout Francia, were no doubt held at St Denis during these stays.

The monks also enhanced their alliance with the crown by interpolating and celebrating anniversaries for their royal benefactors. Such ceremonies began in earnest in the 12th century, when Abbot Adam (1099–1122) compiled a ritual entitled In natali Dagoberti regis, which drew on the ritual of the Office of the Dead and the Requiem Mass. The monks arranged this and all subsequent anniversaries in much the same manner that they ordered the standard feasts of the liturgical year: they specified numbers of singers for prominent chants, numbers of candles, type of ceremonial garb, and the like, in strictly hierarchical fashion. During the 13th century the anniversaries for King Dagobert and Philip Augustus were the most resplendent, equalling the pomp of Christmas, Easter and other principal feasts. Certain other kings (Philip IV, Charles IV, Louis X, Philip III, Louis VIII, Robert II and Louis VI) had only a slightly lower level of observance, similar to the duplex services for feasts of saints whose relics lay in the church. The ever-growing number of royal anniversaries seems to have checked the expansion of the St Denis calendar in the 14th and 15th centuries, preventing the abbey from embracing the festivals of popular saints of the late Middle Ages (e.g. Valery, Joseph, Lazarus) as well as some of the late Marian feasts.

Like the royal-monastic alliance, the four rebuildings of St Denis and the lesser additions to the fabric of the church inspired the creation of new rituals. The original basilica (*c*475), refurbished by King Dagobert in the 7th century, was replaced by Abbot Fulrad's (750–84) Carolingian church in the late 8th century. Abbot Hilduin and William the Conqueror, respectively, added a chapel and a tower to the structure in the 9th and 11th centuries. Hilduin's chapel was dedicated to Mary and All Saints and probably occasioned the compilation of seven masses for Mary and All Saints, found in the sacramentary F-R A.566. When Abbot Suger (1122–51) built the Gothic church in the 1140s, he renewed the performance of the Saturday Office for the Virgin, established the Thursday Office for St Denis, and undoubtedly oversaw the copying of the magnificent antiphoner F-Pn lat.17296 (inventory in CAO, ii, 1965). The final reconstruction of St Denis, which took place under four abbots who served between 1231 and 1281, witnessed a dramatic increase in the number of processions to chapels in the chevet, the elevation of the ranks of feasts, the copying of additional new service books, the composition of new sequences, and the foundation of a Confraternity of St Denis. By the mid-14th century, the liturgy of St Denis was virtually complete, although a daily Lady Mass for the Chapel of Notre Dame La Blanche in the north transept was added in the late 14th century. By 1411 there were 24 chaplaincies in the church, many of them endowed by lay persons.

2. SOURCES. The substantial number of service books from St Denis that have survived offer access to the music, as well as the ceremonies, of the church. For the chants of the Office there is the antiphoner F-Pn lat.17296, which, in combination with the ordinals from the 13th and the 14th centuries (F-Pm 526, Pn lat.976, Paris, Archives Nationales L 863, no.10), aptly depicts the celebration of the medieval Office in the abbey. Music for the Mass is preserved in four notated graduals and missals dating from the 11th and 14th centuries (F-Pm 384; Pn lat.1107; Pn lat.10505; GB-Lv 1346–1891); all but the third are splendidly illuminated. The gradual-antiphoner of Mont-Renaud (PalMus, 1st ser. xvi, 1955/R), once thought to hail from St Denis (G. Beyssac, RdM, xl, 1957, pp.131–50), is now thought to have originated in the abbey of Corbie or one of its dependencies (Robertson, 1991, pp.425–34).

Several St Denis sources exemplify the various developments in French notation. The slightly slanted neumes found in F-Pm 384 (facs. in R.-J. Hesbert, Le graduel de St. Denis, Paris, 1981; see NOTATION, §III, 1(iv)(a)), which may be taken as typical of the St Denis scriptorium in the 11th century, gave way to the 12th-century neumes on dry-point staff lines of F-Pn lat.17296. By contrast, the perfectly straight neumes of F-Pn lat.9436, a sacramentary-gradual which was copied for St Denis, show its place of origin to be the scriptorium of St Vaast in Arras. The later square notation of St Denis is illustrated in the 13th- and 14th-century missals.

3. MUSIC. Despite the imposition of Roman chant throughout the Frankish Church by the early Carolingians, several chants of Gallican origin are thought to have been preserved at St Denis. Several of the great processional antiphons found near the end of F-Pn lat.17296 are likely to be Gallican, along with the antiphon Deus omnipotens in F-Pm 384, which contains a popular Merovingian configuration of the names of the patron saint and his two companions in martyrdom, Eleutherius and Rusticus. (In texts from the 8th century onwards, these names appear in the order Dionysius, Rusticus, Eleutherius.) Antiphons were chanted before the Gospel reading at St Denis on the 18 highest feasts of the year (see GALLICAN CHANT, §7(vii)), and a few of these may also be Gallican survivors or remodellings of such chants, for example, Salvator omnium Deus, which the monks sang on King Dagobert's anniversary (Walters, 1985).

As with the liturgy of St Denis, the musical repertory grew along with the church. Prosulas for the feasts of St Stephen, St John, the Holy Innocents and the Virgin Mary, found alongside a sizable number of responsory melismas in F-Pn lat.17296, are unique to St Denis. Ex.1 shows the prosula Christo nato de Virgine, for the feast of the Holy Innocents. The tropes for the Mass Proper in F-Pn lat.1107 include several well-known examples for Christmas and Easter, as well as many of the widely circulated tropes for the Mass Ordinary. St Denis sources are the sole witness to one Kyrie trope (O Christe precamur), the incipit of which appears in F-Pm 526 (ed. in E. Foley, The First Ordinary of the Royal Abbey of St. Denis in France, Fribourg, 1990) and F-Pn lat.976, and to the music of one untexted melismatic communion trope for St Stephen found in F-Pm 384.

Other music composed in the abbey undoubtedly includes the various Offices for St Denis himself. One of the most intriguing of these is an 11th-century rhymed Office, Cum sol nocturnas (F-Pm 384, ff.160–61*v*), written in Leonine hexameters and notated in neumes that include a few significative letters (see Robertson, 1991, pl.9). This Office promotes the confusion between the true St Denis and Dionysius the Areopagite, and it contains some Neoplatonic allusions, although it does not specifically touch on Pseudo-Dionysian philosophy. The occasion for this Office was probably a mid-11th century controversy in which the congregation of St Emmeram of Regensburg claimed to possess some sacred remains of St Denis. The monk of St Denis responded by opening the reliquary of the saint, and Cum sol nocturnas, which dates from this period, may have been penned in commemoration of this event.

Ex.1 F-Pn lat.17296, ff.39*v*–40

In addition, the responsory Clavus refulgens was composed at St Denis in 1233 in honour of the miraculous finding of the Holy Nail of the Passion that belonged to the monastery. A rubric for this chant was incorporated into a short-lived service in F-Pm 526 to mark the event, and the feast was celebrated on Friday of Easter Week. Likewise, the completion of the Gothic church a few decades later prompted the creation of 11 sequences for the saints whose remains were in the altars of the chapels radiating from the chevet. All but one of these sequences are contrafacta of pre-existing works, most of them in honour of the Virgin. The sequence Salve pater Dyonisi (AH, xliv, 1904/R), however, was original, both in melody and in text. This work is an intriguing amalgam of references to the various visions of St Denis: it calls him 'mirror and summit of the wise of Greece', an allusion to the Athenian Dionysius, and it also expresses the Pseudo-Dionysian concepts of the 'order of the heavenly army', the 'seraphim' and 'cherubim', and the association of the latter with 'clarity' and 'light'.

Two important series of monophonic melodies for the BENEDICAMUS DOMINO and ITE MISSA EST found in the 13th-century missal F-Pn lat.1107 help explain the written and unwritten histories of these genres. Most striking are the length and expansiveness of these melodies, for they are taken from the melismas of other prolix chants (usually reponsories and alleluias). Specific directions for their liturgical placement appear in the ordinals; like the melodies for the Ordinary of the Mass, the tunes for the Benedicamus Domino and Ite missa est were ordered hierarchically, so that one melody might serve the highest feasts, while another was used for duplex festivals of saints whose relics lay in the church, and so forth. The method of recording the chants in F-Pn lat.1107 is especially noteworthy: they are preserved in the kyriale, preceded by cues naming the sources of the melismas. The presence of the cues suggests that these chants were composed orally, and the placement of syllables, along with the phrasing, which most often corresponds to that of the parent source, strengthens the impression of oral improvisation. These procedures may account for the fact that music for the Benedicamus Domino and Ite missa est is scarce in the late Middle Ages.

4. THEORISTS. Two music theorists were apparently connected with St Denis. The late-13th-century Tractatus de tonis of GUY DE SAINT-DENIS deals with plainchant and draws on Boethius, Guido of Arezzo, Petrus de Cruce and Johannes de Garlandia. Most of his examples are taken from the music of the abbey, and he often distinguishes between the practice at St Denis ('secundum usum nostrum') and the use of Notre Dame of Paris and Amiens Cathedral. The Tractatus de Musica of PETRUS DE SANCTO DIONYSIO (ed. U. Michels, CSM, xvii, 1972) shows this monk's familiarity with current mensural practices of the early 14th century, particularly those of Johannes de Muris. St Denis seems to have cultivated little if any polyphony, and Petrus probably came to know de Muris's work as a student at the Collège de Saint-Denis, a residence in Paris for scholar-monks of the abbey (Nebbiai-Dalla Guarda, 1982). Michels (op. cit.) suggested that Petrus is the same as Anonymus 6 (CoussemakerS, iii, 398–403) because of the striking similarities in the first parts of the two treatises.

Much of the individuality of the divine service at St Denis disappeared in the early 17th century, when the abbey was reformed according to the statutes of the Congregation of St Maur. Musical developments at St Denis are difficult to trace after this time, although the monastery was well known for its fine organs in the late 17th century and the 18th. The liturgical books of the abbey entered the various European libraries largely as a result of catastrophic events. During the Huguenot incursions in 1567, many manuscripts were destroyed or removed, later to be purchased by noted collectors. Similar anti-royalist onslaughts during the years immediately following the French Revolution saw the removal of the remaining manuscripts. The final monastic Office at St Denis was celebrated on 14 September 1792; under Napoleon St Denis served as a Collège de Jeunes Filles de la Légion d'Honneur. Today it is a parish church.

ANNE WALTERS ROBERTSON

St Denis, Ruth (b Newark, NJ, 20 Jan 1877; d Los Angeles, 21 July 1968). American dancer. See BALLET, §4.

Sainte-Colombe [Sainte Coulombe], Jean de (fl 1658–87; d by 1701). French viol player and composer. He has been identified from signatures on Parisian notary acts dating from the 1650s and 60s. On 23 April 1658 he witnessed the marriage contract of Nicolas Caron, organist at St Thomas du Louvre, who in turn stood witness for Sainte-Colombe's future son-in-law, Jean Varin, on 22 September 1669. This contract is in the name of Sainte-Colombe's eldest daughter, Françoise; Brigide, her sister, is also mentioned, as is Sainte-Colombe's wife, Marie Pichille.

In the late 1660s Sainte-Colombe lived in the rue de Bétizy, Paris, next door to the church of St Germain-l'Auxerrois. Marin Marais lived nearby, as also, in 1666, did one of Sainte-Colombe's colleagues Jean Lacquemant, known as Dubuisson. According to Jean Rousseau, Sainte-Colombe studied the viol with Nicolas Hotman and later became a renowned teacher himself, notably of Marais. He is credited with establishing the use of overspun bass strings, with adding a seventh string to the bass viol and with inventing a new left-hand technique. Another technique known as 'furies', involves passages entirely in demisemiquavers using separate bow strokes, frequently on the lower strings.

Sainte-Colombe's works comprise 180 solo bass viol pieces (in GB-En and the Bibliothèque Municipale, Tournus) and 67 Concerts à deux violes esgales (F-Pn; ed. in PSF i/20, 1973/R). They regularly defy harmonic rules by using parallel 5ths or unresolved dissonances which are quite unsettling to the ear. We find not only the dance forms popular in France at the time, but also the pianelle, a dance in triple time with regular undotted rhythms, unique to Sainte-Colombe. His preludes are of extraordinary length for the period, and his doubles are often unusual in not having the same number of bars as the original dance.

That Sainte-Colombe died by 1701 is evident from Marais's Tombeau pour Monsieur de Sainte-Colombe, published that year. However, his absence from the January 1696 capitation, a Parisian tax list of musicians, and from Abraham du Pradel's 1691 list of Parisian musicians may suggest an even earlier date.

Sainte-Colombe had at least one son, known as 'Monsieur de Sainte-Colombe le fils', who lived for a time in London as a viol player; a benefit concert was held there for him on 14 May 1713. His few extant suites for solo bass viol are at Durham Cathedral. Augustin Dandricourt de Sainte-Colombe, who worked as a viol teacher and chapel musician in Lyons, 1657–70, is probably not connected to the Parisian family.

JONATHAN DUNFORD

St Emmeram. Benedictine abbey in Regensburg, Germany. It was an important centre of musical activity during the Middle Ages. Founded in the late 7th century, the abbey was dedicated to Emmeram, an itinerant Frankish bishop and saint martyred in about 685; his burial place on the 'Mons martyrum' outside Regensburg became a notable place of pilgrimage during the 9th century. In the late 10th century the monastery was the centre of Cluniac reform in Bavaria and became independent of the bishopric of Regensburg in 975. In 1030 the abbot placed Otloh (see OTLOH OF ST EMMERAM) in charge of the monastery school, which, during the 11th and 12th centuries, was to be a significant source of didactic and speculative works on music; among the names associated with the school are OTKER OF ST EMMERAM (author of Mensura quadripartite figure), WILHELM OF HIRSAU and ARIBO. From 1731 until 1803 St Emmeram enjoyed baronial status and became once more a great cultural centre, known especially for painting and science. After this date control of the abbey passed first to the principality of Regensburg and subsequently, at the monastery's dissolution in 1810, to Bavaria.

St Emmeram possessed an extensive library, which by the year 1500 contained more than 600 manuscripts; the collection was taken over by the Staatsbibliothek in Munich in the early 19th century. Several manuscripts are of particular interest to music historians: D-Mbs Clm 9543 (written 817–47, probably by the cleric Engyldeo), containing an alleluia melody with text throughout (Psalle modulamina to the alleluia with the verse Christus resurgens) – an early example, with neumes, of the Roman plainchant practice of providing texts for the melismas; Mbs Clm 14322 (written 1024–6) and 14083 (1031–7), two cantatoria containing, besides the responsorial chants of the Mass, an abundance of troped chants of the Ordinary and Proper of the Mass and some east Frankish sequences, written in German neumes; Mbs Clm 14843 (9th–11th century), containing in its supplement (ff.97–104) liturgical tropes, sequences and hymns without neumes; Clm 14870, containing a plainchant Office of St Emmeram composed in about 1030 by ARNOLD OF ST EMMERAM; Clm 14845, a 12th-century troper whose original flyleaves (ff.1–14) contain tropes, sequences, alleluia verses etc., with neumes; and Clm 14274 (formerly Mus.3233*a*), a quarto manuscript of Bavarian origin and a major mensural source of 15th-century music, containing sacred and secular compositions for three voices mainly by northern French composers from the period around 1400.

KARL-HEINZ SCHLAGER

Saint-Evremond, Charles de Saint-Denis, Seigneur de (bap. St Denis-le-Gast, Manche, 5 Jan 1614; d London, 29 Sept 1703). French man of letters. After studies at the Jesuit college in Paris, he entered military service, rising to the rank of maréchal de camp in 1652. During the Fronde he was disgraced by his Lettre sur la Paix des Pyrénées (1661) and was obliged to seek exile outside France. He fled to the Netherlands and in 1670 to England, where he was appointed Charles II's Keeper of the Ducks in the Decoy at St James's Park. A keen music lover and amateur, Saint-Evremond frequented the Chelsea académie of Hortensia Mancini, the Duchess of Mazarin (the niece of Cardinal Mazarin and mistress of the king), where French music was performed and discussed. His own home in London also became a centre of intellectual and social activity which is reflected in his literary production. He is said never to have learnt to speak English.

Saint-Evremond wrote about music in letters (1674–5), essays, dialogues, poems and a farcical play about the current obsession with Lullian opera entitled Les opéra (1677). His views on opera were expressed at greater length in a letter to the Duke of Buckingham, probably written in 1677–8 and first published in the February 1683 issue of Le mercure galant; with few exceptions he found it boring and banal. He was generally opposed to dramatic works sung entirely from beginning to end. To him, music was a useful ornament to spoken drama, of which only certain features, such as prayers, oaths and expressions of love or sorrow, were suitable for musical setting. He excepted the works of Lully, whom he felt better understood 'the Passions' and entered 'farther into the heart of man than the Authors themselves'. Elsewhere he showed a clear preference for French style over Italian in matters of taste and vocal performance. Even so, he deplored the use of machines and reliance upon supernatural elements. In spite of the limitations of his experience, Saint-Evremond's musical writings, which were known to Le Cerf and Raguenet, constitute a notable contribution to the development of aesthetics and a philosophy of opera during the late 17th and early 18th centuries.

ALBERT COHEN/JULIE ANNE SADIE

St Florian. Monastery near Linz, Austria, founded about 1071 by Augustinian canons. Manuscripts in the monastery library provide evidence of early vocal music in the abbey church; the neumatic notation is similar to that of the St Gallen school and dates from the 9th century. The monastery school, where music was taught in addition to the liberal arts, provided regular church music. Polyphony was first performed in the first half of the 14th century, and in 1475 one of the monks achieved fame as an organist. Instrumental music was played, both in the church and the monastery, from the 16th century onwards. An inventory of 1612 lists a regal, two 'double instruments' and 46 string and woodwind instruments in addition to the main organ. There have been composers at St Florian throughout its existence. Among those recorded in the 17th century were Josef Haug, J.K. Merkl, Melchior Kämpfel and Stefan Vogl. The most famous regens chori of the 18th century was F.J. Aumann. David Fuhrmann initiated the reconstruction of the monastery in Baroque style (1686–1750), and F.X. Chrismann was commissioned to build the organ in the rebuilt church. This famous instrument originally had three manuals, 59 registers and 5230 pipes, and has since been enlarged to four manuals, 103 registers and 7343 pipes. It is known as the 'Bruckner Organ' in memory of St Florian's greatest musician.

Bruckner, born near St Florian in 1824, was a choirboy at the monastery where he was taught music by the monks. Later he himself taught in the surrounding parishes and in St Florian itself. He was also organist at the monastery in the 1840s and 50s; he subsequently lived in

Abbey church of Mariä Himmelfahrt, St Florian, designed by Carlo Antonio Carlone, 1686–95; the organ by Franz Xaver Chrismann, 1774, is known as the 'Bruckner Organ'

Linz and Vienna but often visited St Florian for short periods and is buried there. In 1906–24 F.X. Müller (1870–1948) was director of music at the monastery, where he wrote his Augustinus-Messe (1911) and other works. In 1924 he moved to Linz, where he became Kapellmeister of the cathedral.

The monastery's music archives must once have been among the richest in Austria; however, through the rebuilding in the 18th century and inept administration in the mid-19th century much material was lost. Nevertheless, the library contains about 121,000 printed volumes and 800 manuscripts.

ALTMAN KELLNER

Saint-Foix, (Marie-Olivier-)Georges (Poulain), Comte de (b Paris, 2 March 1874; d Aix-en-Provence, 26 May 1954). French musicologist. While studying law at the Sorbonne he was a pupil of d'Indy at the Paris Schola Cantorum, where he studied the violin (diploma 1906) and music theory, also becoming an able quartet player. From 1900, encouraged by Théodore de Wyzewa, he devoted himself to musicology and became a leading authority on 18th-century music, especially that of Mozart. With Wyzewa and Adolphe Boschot he founded the Société Mozart in 1901. As a member of the Aix-en-Provence Académie des Arts et Sciences he contributed greatly to the artistic direction of the festival there. He was also a founder-member of the Société Française de Musicologie, where he twice served as president, and a member of the Académie des Beaux-Arts and the Accademia di S Cecilia, Rome; Saint-Foix received awards from the Austrian government and the Salzburg Mozarteum as well as the honorary doctorate from Edinburgh University.

Saint-Foix's major work was his five-volume study of Mozart's life and works, of which the first two volumes (to 1777) were written with Wyzewa. It shows unprecedentedly minute analysis and chronological classification of Mozart's works based on their style; while modern source research has revealed errors in the chronology and shown this treatment to be too narrowly schematic, the book remains a fundamental study and particularly valuable for its detailed accounts of Mozart's forerunners and contemporaries in relation to his style. This topic, and the corresponding one of Mozart's influence on his successors (especially Beethoven and Schubert), forms a central interest of Saint-Foix's other writings, such as the articles on Schobert, Gluck, Sammartini, J.C. Bach and French symphonists around 1750 and his revision of Picquot's book on Boccherini.

St Gallen. Benedictine monastery in Switzerland, and one of the most important musical and literary centres during the Carolingian and Ottonian periods; also the city of the same name.

1. History to 1300. 2. 1300 to the present. 3. The chant tradition. 4. The city.

1. HISTORY TO 1300. The origins of St Gallen go back to a hermitage established in *c*613 by the Irish saint Gallus (*c*550–*c*627). Gallus had accompanied St Columbanus to the Continent. Exiled from Luxueil by the Merovingian King Theuderic II (595–613), Columbanus went to Zürich and later to Bobbio. Gallus, however, fell ill and stayed at Zürich, founding his hermitage nearby, where he was joined by a small community. In 720 St Othmar (*c*689–759) took charge of the hermitage and founded the cloister. The house followed a Rule based on that of Columbanus until 760, when it became dependent on the bishopric of Konstanz and adopted the Benedictine Rule. Louis the Pious (814–40) made St Gallen an independent royal abbey in 818.

With the 9th century, under Abbot Gozbert (816–37) the monastery entered its period of greatest prosperity, both economic and artistic. Rebuilding began in 830, perhaps following a plan still extant in the library. The learned and powerful abbots Grimald (841–72) and Salomo (890–920) enlarged the cloister's holdings and encouraged its intellectual life. Scholars, poets, and musicians flourished under them, notably Hartmann II (d 864), the Irishman Moengal (d 869), Iso (d 871), Ratpert (d 890), Notker 'Balbulus' (d 912) and Tuotilo (d 915). Their output consisted of chronicles, biblical commentaries, hymns, antiphons, tropes, versus and versus ad sequentias, including Notker's Liber hymnorum, an extraordinary cycle of versus ad sequentias inspired by the proses in an antiphoner brought to St Gallen by a monk from Jumièges *c*860.

The achievements of the Carolingian school at St Gallen were mainly literary, although it is likely that Hartmann, Ratpert and perhaps Notker wrote melodies for some of their works. It is almost certain that Tuotilo, a poet, instrumentalist and sculptor, composed the melodies of his tropes (e.g. Hodie cantandus). The outstanding achievement, however, remains Notker's development of the fully-fledged East Frankish versus ad sequentiam from the West Frankish models (see Crocker).

The community was also concerned with the preservation of liturgical chant. The monks regarded St Gallen and Metz as the main centres of the authentic Roman tradition. From this belief there rose the legend that during the reign of Charlemagne (d 814) the Roman cantors Petrus and Romanus, bound for Metz, had arrived at St Gallen, that Romanus had fallen ill and remained there, and that he had taught the authentic Roman tradition to the abbey's schola and introduced the use of the significative (or 'Romanian') letters. The source for the legend, with the symbolic names of the cantors and the striking parallel to the foundation of St Gallen, is the Casus monasterii Sancti Galli by Ekkehard IV (d 1060). No earlier document, including the earlier Casus, mentions it.

The artistic traditions of the monastery continued until the early 11th century through the works of Ekkehard I (d 973), Hartker (d 1011), Notker Labeo (or 'Teutonicus'; d 1022), translator of Boethius and of Martianus Capella and writer of the earliest music treatise in German, and Ekkehard IV. Nevertheless, the 10th century brought a decline in royal support; there were invasions by the Hungarians in 925 and the Saracens in 954. Emperor Conrad II (1024–39) in 1034 ordered the adoption at St Gallen of the Cluniac reforms, which further constricted artistic activity. The Annales ceased in 1044 and the Casus in the early 13th century. It is significant that when the Casus was resumed in 1335 in German by Christian Küchemeister, he should have been a townsman, not a monk.

2. 1300 TO THE PRESENT. By the 14th century St Gallen had lost its strong intellectual tradition. Abbot Heinrich von Gundelfingen (1411–17) allowed the members of the Council of Konstanz (1414–18) to remove hundreds of manuscripts, most of which were never returned. Similar depredations occurred during the Council of Basle (1431–49). The early 16th century brought a revival of music at the monastery. Joachim Cuontz copied manuscript 546, the last of the St Gallen tropers, in 1507. Fridolin Sicher (1490–1546) became organist in 1515 and contributed a songbook and a tablature to the library (MSS 461, 530). Part-singing began in 1531, but instrumental music was not admitted until 1692 despite an attempt to introduce it in 1645. Two songbooks, the Heer Liederbuch (MS 462) and the Tschudi Liederbuch (MS 463), came to the monastery from the historian Aegidius Tschudi (1505–72). The Reformation clashes did not spare St Gallen. It was occupied by the Protestants (1529–31) and sacked by Berne and Zürich in 1712, when the church's paintings were destroyed and the library looted. Most of the books taken to Berne were returned; those in Zürich were sold and some eventually entered the Zentralbibliothek. The 17th and 18th centuries were musically undistinguished at St Gallen.

The monastery was dissolved in 1805, but the library remained in the custody of some of the former monks, notably the historian Idelfons von Arx (1750–1833). In 1844 St Gallen was made a bishopric; the conventual church became the cathedral and the library is now the capitular library. It remains among the most important monastic libraries still in situ, with some fundamental sources for the history of plainchant, including some of the earliest fully notated chant books. The liturgical and musical manuscripts comprise nos.337*b*–547, including 339 (PalMus, 1st ser., i, 1889/R), a 10th-century gradual; 359 (PalMus, 2nd ser., ii, 1924/R), a cantatorium, *c*900; 390–91 (PalMus, 2nd ser., i, 1900/R), the 10th-century antiphoner of Hartker (d 1011); and a group of tropers (10th to 12th century): 376, 378, 380, 381, 382 and 484. The tropers are particularly important as sources for the works of the St Gallen school of the 9th and 10th centuries.

3. THE CHANT TRADITION. The manuscripts mentioned above reflect the rise of the cloister's musical scriptorium in the 9th, 10th and 11th centuries, which produced liturgical manuscripts not only for St Gallen but for other centres such as Minden. They are notated in a fine neumatic script different from German neumes, which appears in some other Swiss and south German scriptoria (e.g. Einsiedeln and St Emmeram). They transmit a graphic tradition of chant characterized mainly by numerous rhythmic neume forms, episemata and significative letters. Few sources are as rich in rhythmic signs as these: even though rhythmic notation was used in sources from nearly every region, they predominate in the early East Frankish and Messine sources.

The notation in the early St Gallen manuscripts is not diastematic, but shows traits suggesting the melodic versions that Peter Wagner called the 'German plainsong dialect' (Wagner, 1930–32/R, ii, pp.v–xxxvi). The influence of the monastery was perhaps overstressed by the monks of Solesmes in their restoration of the chant, and some scholars have suggested that St Gallen was perhaps peripheral to the main tradition of plainchant. The lasting influence and popularity of the Carolingian and Ottonian poet-musicians of the abbey, however, is attested by the wide diffusion of their works. (See also NOTATION, §III, 1(iv)(a).)

4. THE CITY. St Gallen grew around the cloister in Carolingian times; until the 14th century it was ruled by the abbots, but it became independent in 1353 and a royal town in 1450. Joachim von Watt (Vadianus) (1484–1551), a Reformation leader, founded the Stadtsbibliothek with his own library. Dominicus Zyli published a German hymnal in the city before 1553, and in 1682 Christian Huber (d 1697) published his influential Geistliche Seelenmusik there. One of his descendants, Ferdinand Huber (1791–1863), became a prominent composer of lieder. A collegium musicum was founded in 1620 and evolved into the Städtsingerverein, as it is known today. The city has a symphony orchestra, founded by Albert Meyer (1847–1933), and another choir, the St Galler Kammerchor, founded in 1937. Younger ensembles include a period instrument ensemble, the Collegium Musicum St Gallens, and the Bach Choir.

Saint-Gelais [Sainct-Gelays], Mellin [Merlin] de (b Angoulême, 1491; d Paris, 1558). French poet and musician. He was the son or nephew of Octavien de Saint-Gelais, a rhetorical poet and Bishop of Angoulême from 1495. From 1508 to 1517 he studied law at the universities of Bologna and Padua. He was among the first French writers to import the spirit of the Italian Renaissance; his light and galant verse, influenced by Petrarch, Bembo and Ariosto in forms such as the sonnet, capitolo, madrigale and villanesca, made him the most fêted poet at the court of François I, whom he served as almoner and librarian. Although pirated editions of his poetry appeared at Lyons in 1547 and 1574, he followed the example of the strambottists Cariteo, Il Tebaldeo and Serafino by avoiding publication and winning fame through his declamatory improvisation. He also wrote a large number of works in more traditional French forms.

His musical talents were extolled by contemporary authors, including Tyard, who compared his lute playing with that of Alberto da Ripa, and Barthélemy Aneau, who described him as a poet 'who composes, better indeed than all others, lyrical verses, sets them to music, sings them, plays and performs them on instruments … in this respect he comprises divers persons, being poet [and] musician, [both] vocal and instrumental' (B. Aneau: Le Quintil Horatien, Lyons, 1556, included in J. Du Bellay, La deffence et illustration de la langue françoyse, ed. E. Parson, Versailles, 1878, p.205, with attribution to Charles Fontaine).

No musical compositions specifically attributed to Saint-Gelais survive. However, the popularity of his strophic poetry in the voix de ville repertory of the mid-16th century suggests that his music may have been based on existing dance tunes. The 1547 edition of his verse includes an amorous complainte in capitolo form (11 three-line stanzas), Hélas mon Dieu y'a il en ce monde, with the instruction: 'Pour dire au luth en chant italien'. In the 1574 edition this is changed to '… sur la chanson des nègres sur la guyterre, Se lo commo non me dan'. In two contemporary manuscripts his 38-line poem of separation Pour m'esloingner is described: 'This piece, taken from Ariosto [Qual son, qual sempre fui], is to be recited to the lute or guitar with the tune called 'Romanesca' which is repeated for each pair of lines'. The romanesca melody and bass are clear in Certon's four-voice setting of 1552. Saint-Gelais' verse abounds in lyrical metaphors; one piece is entitled 'Sur un luth', another 'Pour la guiterre' and a third humorously suggests that the latch of a lady's boudoir makes sweeter music than either spinet, flute or lute.

His verse figures more prominently than that of any other poet in musical collections printed during the decade between the death of Clement Marot in 1543 and the publication of Ronsard's Amours in 1552. More than 70 of his poems were set between 1533 and 1590 by 54 composers, including Arcadelt, Certon, Crecquillon, Janequin, Lassus, Le Roy, Sandrin and Sermisy.

FRANK DOBBINS

Saint-Georges [Saint-George], Joseph Bologne, Chevalier de (b Baillif, Guadeloupe, 25 Dec 1745; d Paris, 9 June 1799). French composer and violinist. He was the son of a Guadeloupe planter, George Bologne, and his African slave Nanon. Although his father called himself 'de Saint-Georges', after one of his properties, he was officially ennobled only in 1757, when he acquired the title of ordinaire de la chambre du roi. (Some biographers have mistaken him for Pierre Boullongne-Tavernier, controlleur général of finance, whose nobility dated back to the 15th century; such confusion originated with de Beauvoir's novel of 1840.) In 1747 George Bologne was accused unjustly of murder and fled to France with Nanon and her child to prevent their being sold. After two years he was granted a royal pardon and the family returned to Guadeloupe. In 1753 George took Joseph to France permanently.

At the age of 13 Saint-Georges became a pupil of La Boëssière, a master of arms, and excelled in all physical exercises, especially fencing. When still a student Saint-Georges beat Alexandre Picard, a fencing-master of Rouen, who had mocked him as 'La Boëssière's upstart mulatto', and was rewarded by his father with a horse and buggy. On graduating, at the age of 19, he was made a Gendarme de la Garde du Roi and dubbed chevalier. After the end of the Seven Years War, George Bologne returned to his Guadeloupe plantations, leaving his son with a handsome annuity. The young chevalier became the darling of fashionable society; all contemporary accounts speak of his romantic conquests. In 1766 the Italian fencer Giuseppe Faldoni came to Paris to challenge Saint-Georges. Faldoni won, but proclaimed Saint-Georges the finest swordsman in Europe.

Nothing is known of Saint-Georges' early musical training. However, after 1764, works dedicated to him by Gossec and Lolli suggest that Gossec was his composition teacher and that Lolli taught him violin. Saint-Georges' technical approach was similar to that of Gaviniés, who may also have taught him, but Fétis's claim that he studied with Leclair is mere conjecture. In 1769 he became a member of Gossec's new orchestra, the Concert des Amateurs, at the Hôtel de Soubise, and was soon named its leader.

Saint-Georges made his début as a solo violinist with the Amateurs in 1772, performing his first two violin concertos op.2 to critical acclaim. These concertos reveal him to have been a prodigious virtuoso. The solo parts make extensive use of the highest positions and the composer revels in the possibilities of the newly invented Tourte bow, with bold, détaché strokes and intricate batteries and bariolage. But virtuosity was not his principal aim. The slow movements of the concertos are songful and expressive, with occasional touches of Creole nostalgia. When Gossec became a director of the Concert Spirituel in 1773, Saint-Georges was appointed musical director of the Amateurs, which rapidly became one of the best orchestras in Europe.

After his father's death in 1774, Saint-Georges' annuity stopped and music became his livelihood. Between 1773 and 1779 he published most of his instrumental music, including two sets of string quartets (some of the first in Paris), a dozen violin concertos and at least 10 symphonies concertantes, becoming a chief exponent of that new, intrinsically Parisian genre. Like the string quartets, the symphonies concertantes have only two movements, while the violin concertos have three.

In 1776 a proposal to make Saint-Georges music director of the Paris Opéra was blocked by a quartet of its leading ladies, who petitioned Queen Marie Antoinette to spare them from 'degrading their honour and delicate conscience by having them submit to the orders of a mulatto'. To defuse the scandal, Louis XVI nationalized the Opéra. A year after his first serious setback due to his colour, Saint-Georges presented his first opera, Ernestine, at the Comédie-Italienne. The critics praised the music but predicted that it could not overcome the weak libretto; it did not survive its première. Undaunted, Saint-Georges abandoned composing instrumental music to devote himself to operas. Mme de Montesson, morganatic wife of the Duke of Orléans, engaged him as music director of her private theatre and, as an added incentive, appointed him Lieutenant de chasse of the Duke's hunting estate at Raincy. His opera La partie de chasse (1778) was performed there, while L'amant anonyme received its première at Mme de Montesson's theatre in 1780.

In January 1781 the Amateurs were disbanded, owing to financial losses incurred during the American War of Independence. Soon after, Saint-Georges founded the Concert de la Loge Olympique, part of the exclusive freemason club La Loge Olympique. As its fame increased, the orchestra moved from the Palais Royal to larger quarters at the Tuileries. It was for this ensemble, at the behest of the Loge's grand-master, Baron d'Ogny, that Saint-Georges commissioned Haydn's Paris symphonies.

On the death of the Duke of Orléans in 1785, Saint-Georges lost his position in that household. In 1787, invited by the fencing-master Angelo, he went to London, where he gave exhibition fencing matches, including one at Carlton House before the Prince of Wales; a painting by Robineau shows Saint-Georges fighting the enigmatic transvestite 'La Chevalière' d'Eon. The prince also commissioned the young Bostonian Mather Brown to paint Saint-Georges' portrait. When asked if it was a good likeness the composer replied: 'Oh Madame, so good, it's frightful!' (see illustration). Returning to Paris, he composed and produced his most successful comedy, La fille-garçon, and resumed work at the Loge Olympique.

Joseph Bologne de Saint-Georges: stipple engraving by William Ward after Mather Brown, 1787

Saint-Georges was introduced to the revolutionary circle around the young Duke of Orléans (later Philippe-Egalité) by Laclos and Brissot, founders of the abolitionist Société des Amis des Noirs, and joined the duke and Laclos on their 1789 journey to London. The following year he undertook a tour of northern France with the actress Louise Fusil and the horn player Lamothe. In Belgium he was denounced as an agent for Philippe-Egalité and expelled from Tournai by the French émigrés there. Bedridden by a long illness in Lille, he wrote his last opera, Guillaume tout coeur, for that city. He also joined the National Guard, and in 1792 the Paris Assembly made him colonel of the Légion des Américains et du Midi, which comprised 'citizens of colour' (including Thomas-Alexandre Dumas, father of the novelist Alexandre Dumas père). Saint-Georges was accused of misconduct but managed to clear his name, going on to help save Lille from a counter-revolutionary plot by General Dumouriez. However, in November 1793 he became a victim of the Reign of Terror and spent 18 months in the military prison of Hondainville near Clermont-sur- Oise. Freed after the fall of Robespierre, the mulatto colonel fought a long battle to regain his regiment, ending with an order to avoid Arras, its garrison town.

In 1795 Saint-Georges sailed with Lamothe to Saint Domingue, which was in the grip of a slave revolt. Having been given up for dead, they returned to Paris two years later. Saint-Georges directed another orchestra at the masonic Cercle de l'Harmonie, according to the Mercure 'leaving nothing to be desired as to the choice of works or the superiority of the execution'. He died in 1799, of an 'ulcerated bladder'.

Saint-Georges, Jules-Henri Vernoy de (b Paris, 7 Nov 1799; d Paris, 23 Dec 1875). French librettist. Declared by Barbey d'Aurevilly the 'père éternel' of the libretto, he was one of the most prolific operatic plot writers of the 19th century. Over his 50-year career he wrote more than 70 works, almost entirely in collaboration; with Eugène Scribe he dominated theatrical production in the 1830s and 40s. Although he produced successful operas, such as La reine de Chypre (1841) for Halévy, as well as ballets, notably Giselle (1841, with Gautier and Coralli), he lacked Scribe's generic adaptability. Happiest in the world of opéra-comique, his plots changed little from one decade to the next. Never unpredictable, he retained a belief in the importance of simple characterisation and improbable coincidence that at best (as in La fille du régiment) moved the plot along seamlessly and at worst (La jolie fille de Perth) revealed the need for a fresh approach. In person he remained similarly rooted in the past, affecting the affable manners and extravagant dress of an 18th-century nobleman.

BENJAMIN WALTON

Saint Germain, Count of (d Eckernförde, 27 Feb 1784). Courtier, adventurer, amateur scientist, inventor and dilettante musician. He purposely concealed his background and identity, and used such pseudonyms as Count Welldone, Prince Ragotzy, Count Bellamare and Count Surmont on his wide travels throughout Europe. Further confusion has arisen with the like-named French general Claude Louis de Saint Germain and with Robert-François Quesnay de Saint Germain, an ardent occultist who may have written the essays La très sainte Trinosofie and La magie sainte (still used by Freemasons) that are attributed to the count. Gerber, alone among the many commentators on Saint Germain's life (which has many times been made the subject of fiction, by George Sand and Bulwer-Lytton for instance), maintained that he was identical with an obscure violinist and composer in Berlin named GIOVANNINI, but this is improbable. Saint Germain was most likely either the son of Franz Leopold Rákóczi, exiled Prince of Transylvania, or the illegitimate son of Maria-Anna of Neubourg, widow of Charles II of Spain. In his youth he was probably a protégé of the Grand Duke Gian Gastone (the last of the Medicis) and may have studied at Siena University. He appeared in London society from about 1743, and in 1758 was in Paris, where he became a favourite of Mme de Pompadour and Louis XV. After an embarrassing affair as an unofficial political agent in The Hague (1760) he returned briefly to England. Further travels took him to Russia, Germany and Italy; he visited Berlin at the invitation of Friedrich August of Brunswick, and in 1779 Prince Karl of Hesse, his last patron, gave him a building for his scientific experiments. He claimed to have made several discoveries applicable to manufacturing processes and was associated with industries in the Low Countries.

Most of Saint Germain's musical activities were associated with his visits to England, although his talent was also praised by the French courtiers. According to Burney, the 'celebrated and mysterious' Count Saint Germain contributed several songs to the pasticcio L'incostanza delusa (1745) and attended its rehearsals with Prince Lobkowitz (to whom the libretto was dedicated); his 'Per pietà bell' idol mio' was encored nightly, but Burney considered the other songs in the published score insipid. Horace Walpole, who claimed that the count had been in England for about two years by December 1745, described him as follows: 'He sings, plays on the violin wonderfully, composes, is mad and not very sensible'. He published in London several sentimental English songs, a collection of 42 Italian arias (Musique raisonnée) and a book each of trio sonatas and solo violin sonatas. The aria collection includes the three from L'incostanza delusa; texts and music range from unpretentious idylls to intense dramas, all with considerable emphasis on accurate text rendering. His trio sonatas combine polyphonic and homophonic styles, but the violin sonatas are more Rococo in character.

Saint-Huberty [Huberti], Mme de [Clavel, Antoinette Cécile] (b Strasbourg, 15 Dec 1756; d London, 22 July 1812). French soprano. Her professional name derives from the name assumed by her first husband. She studied in Warsaw with J.B. Lemoyne and, after a period in Strasbourg, eventually reached Paris where she created Mélisse in Gluck's Armide (1777). A fine actress, she was the mistress of the Opéra for a short time, eclipsing Rosalie Levasseur and Marie-Joséphine Laguerre to take over such roles as Gluck's Alcestis and Piccinni's Angélique (Roland) and Sangaride (contributing to the success of the 1783 revival of Atys). Her greatest triumph was in Piccinni's Didon (1783; for illustration see PICCINNI family, fig.3); she also created Hypermnestra in Salieri's Les Danaïdes and the title roles in Sacchini's Chimène, Edelmann's Ariane and Lemoyne's Phèdre. Unreliable in attendance at the Opéra, she forfeited her place to Mlle Maillard. During the Revolution she emigrated with the Count of Antraigues. They were married in 1790, but the marriage was not announced until 1797, when he was imprisoned by Napoleon in Italy; she assisted in his rescue. They ended their lives in exile in London, where they were assassinated by a servant.

St James's Hall. London concert hall built in 1858. See LONDON (i), §VI, 2(ii).

Saint Lambert, Monsieur de (fl Paris, *c*1700). French harpsichordist, pedagogue and composer. Remarks in his Principes suggest that he worked as a harpsichord teacher, primarily in Paris. The first name 'Michel', frequently attributed to him, derives from the conflation of Saint Lambert with the singer and composer Michel Lambert, an error that goes back at least as far as Walther's Musicalisches Lexicon (1732).

Les principes du clavecin was, as its author claimed, the first method book for the harpsichord, antedating François Couperin's L'art de toucher le clavecin by 14 years. Its first 18 chapters, devoted primarily to fundamentals of music, contain significant information regarding the range of the harpsichord, the performance practice of the slur (of particular value for the performance of préludes non mesurés) and a chapter on metre and tempo. Of the remaining chapters, one is devoted to fingering (including a fully fingered minuet and gavotte) and the other nine to ornamentation. By reproducing and commenting on the ornament symbols of four 17th-century keyboard composers – Chambonnières, Nivers, Lebègue and especially D'Anglebert – Saint Lambert provided a useful comparative perspective on the performance practices of his day.

The Nouveau traité de l'accompagnement is equally systematic, working progressively through the mechanics of figured bass realization on keyboard instruments. The last two chapters offer useful commentaries on instances where the rules must be bent or where taste comes into play, such as in the differences between accompanying a recitative and an air.

Although Saint Lambert's teachings were grounded in 17th-century repertory rather than in the new galant style, his ideas on notational reform were forward-looking. He was among the first theorists to suggest the addition of another flat to the signatures of flat keys in the minor mode. He also objected to the use of semi-mensural time signatures such as 3 where 3/2 was meant. The proposal that provoked the most discussion in the 18th century (although it was not adopted into general use) was to simplify keyboard notation by using only clefs in which the pitches would always have the same position on the staff, simply displaced by octave. The clefs he proposed were French violin clef, bass clef and a clef in which c′ is on the second space. In his writings Saint Lambert comes across as a sympathetic and open-minded teacher. Although the books were written with amateurs in mind, one or both were cited, or even plagiarized, by theorists such as Brossard, Rameau, Heinichen, Mattheson and Adlung.

He seems to have had modest abilities as a composer: the minuet and gavotte that appear at the end of the Principes are presumably of his own composition and two volumes from the series of Recueils d'airs sérieux et à boire (Paris, 1701 and 1702) contain songs of his.

REBECCA HARRIS-WARRICK

Saint-Léon [Michel], (Charles Victor) Arthur (b Paris, 17 Sept 1821; d Paris, 2 Sept 1870). French violinist, dancer, choreographer and composer. His real surname was Michel. He studied ballet with his father, a ballet-master at the royal theatre in Stuttgart, and studied the violin with Paganini and Mayseder. He made his début as a violinist in Stuttgart in 1834 and as a dancer in Munich in 1835, when he adopted the name Saint-Léon. In 1837–8 he studied ballet with François Decombe (known as Albert) at the Paris Opéra. From 1838 he toured Europe as a dancer and in 1843 he created the ballet La vivandiera ed il postiglione (music by Rolland) in Rome. He married the ballerina Fanny Cerrito (1817–1909) in 1845; they danced together frequently until their separation in 1851. Meanwhile he became famous as a choreographer. In the early 1850s he was premier maître de ballet at the Opéra. He appeared as choreographer, dancer and violinist in Le lutin de la vallée at the Théâtre Lyrique (1853) and in Le violon du diable at the Opéra (1849). Adolphe Adam wrote admiringly of Saint-Léon's ability to overcome 'the extreme difficulty of taking up the violin in the middle of a scene and playing it at a given moment, without time to make all the preparations that a musician never neglects before starting his solo' (Le constitutionnel, 22 January 1849). He produced numerous ballets in Lisbon (1854–6), was premier maître de ballet at the St Petersburg Imperial Theatres from 1859 to 1870 and was a frequent guest choreographer at the Paris Opéra in the summers. He thus became the dominant figure of both Russian and French ballet for most of the 1860s, and choreographed such popular and significant works as The Humpbacked Horse (St Petersburg, 1864, music by Pugni), La source (Paris, 1866, music by Minkus and Delibes) and Coppélia (Paris, 1870, music by Delibes).

Although Saint-Léon was a talented (if superficial) violinist, he was best known as a dancer and choreographer. He astonished audiences by his high leaps and spectacular pirouettes en l'air but some critics also wrote favourably of his artistic ports de bras. His virile choreography emphasized dance for its own sake and in many cases paid little heed to the story. He developed many new effects, liked to include singers or a violinist (himself) on stage, and made extensive use of character (or folk) dance, choreographing pieces for his ballets in, among others, the Flemish, Italian, Spanish, Scottish and Russian styles. His ballets include La fille de marbre (1847), Tartini il violinista (1848) and Stella (1850) (the music for these composed or adapted by Pugni), Pâquerette (1851, music by Benoist) and about 30 other works. Among his compositions are a violin concerto (1845), numerous salon pieces for the violin and for viole d'amour, and ballet music for Saltarello (1854); scores of some of his compositions may be found in the Fonds Saint-Léon at the Bibliothèque de l'Opéra in Paris. He also developed a system of dance notation, known as Sténochorégraphie, which unlike Feuillet notation (which recorded the track taken by the dancer) took into account the movements of the head, arms and torso. His notation is written on six-line staves above the music, the top line (called the 'shoulder line') reserved for signs indicating movements of the body and arms, the five lower lines for the movements of the legs and feet. He published a work on this notation entitled La sténochorégraphie (Paris, 1852; Eng. trans., 1992), and another work, De l'état actuel de la danse (Lisbon, 1856).

St Louis. City in Missouri, USA. It is on the eastern border of the state, on the Mississippi river just below its confluence with the Missouri river, and was founded in 1764 by French-Canadians; Anglo-American settlers arrived in 1803, Germans after 1830. The Saint Louis SO, whose origins date back to 1880, has become internationally renowned. From the 1890s ragtime and blues underwent considerable development in the city.

1. Art music. 2. Ragtime, blues and jazz. 3. Publishers and education.

1. ART MUSIC. An orchestra, the Philharmonic, was founded in 1838, the same year that the St Louis Musical Fund Society was organized. It was succeeded by the St Louis Musical Society Polyhymnia (active 1845–52) and then by the St Louis Philharmonic Society (founded 1860), which gave 62 concerts in its ten seasons.

In 1881 the St Louis Choral Society (founded in 1880) gave concerts with orchestra, conducted by Joseph Otten. That year the St Louis Musical Union gave its first concert with August Waldauer as conductor. It was absorbed by the Choral Society in 1890, adopting the name Saint Louis Choral Symphony Society. Otten was succeeded by Alfred Ernst in 1894 and Max Zach in 1907. Under Zach the name was changed to the Saint Louis Symphony Society; he improved and enlarged the orchestra and introduced many American and contemporary works. After Zach's death in 1921, Rudolf Ganz was conductor until 1927. Guest conductors led the orchestra until 1931, when Vladimir Golschmann began his tenure. Subsequent conductors have been Edouard Van Remoortel (1958–62), Eleazar Carvalho (1963–8), Walter Susskind (1968–75), Jerzy Semkow (1975–9), Leonard Slatkin (1979–96) and Hans Vonk (from 1996). Raymond Leppard was principal guest conductor from 1984 to 1987. The orchestra has had its own auditorium, Powell Symphony Hall (cap. 2689), since 1968. In 1973 the season was expanded to 52 weeks. Nationwide radio broadcasts began in 1975 and the following year the St Louis Symphony Chorus was organized with Thomas Peck as director; Amy Kaiser succeeded him in 1995. Besides touring the eastern USA annually, the orchestra toured Europe in 1978, 1985, 1993 and 1998, and the Far East in 1986, 1990 and 1995. The orchestra's recordings have received international critical acclaim, and it has commissioned numerous compositions (especially American); composers-in-residence have included Joseph Schwantner, Joan Tower and Claude Baker.

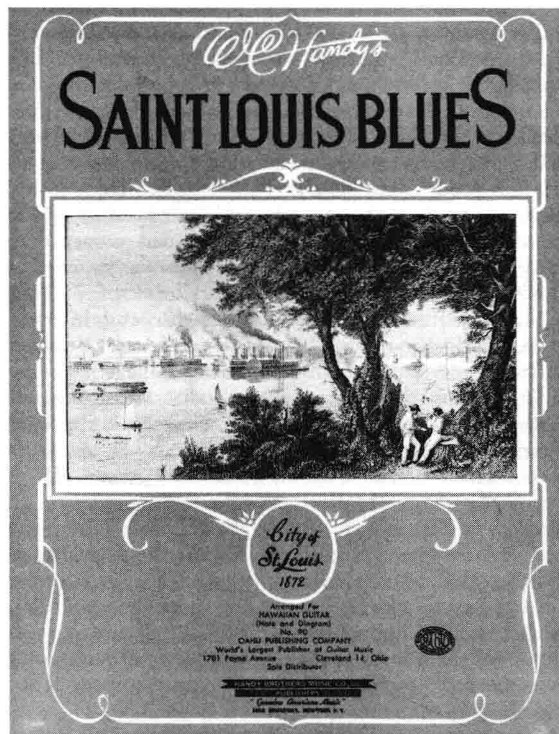
The St Louis Amateur Orchestra was organized at the Beethoven Conservatory of Music in 1893. In 1909 it became the St Louis Orchestra Club, then adopted the name Philharmonic Society of St Louis (the third orchestra to use the name). The St Louis Youth SO was founded in 1970 by the Women's Association of the Saint Louis Symphony.

Chamber music was introduced to St Louis as early as 1807 through the arrival of Joseph Philipson from Philadelphia. Charles Balmer, an organist and conductor and later a music publisher, settled in the city in 1839 and brought many chamber music scores that he had copied in Germany; his performance of Beethoven's Piano Trio op.70 no.1 with John Fallon (violin) and William Robyn (cello) is thought to be among the earliest performances of chamber music by Beethoven in the USA. Formal chamber music activity was given impetus through the Balatka Quintet Club (1877–8), the Philharmonic Quintet Club (1878–97) and the Mendelssohn Quintette Club (1882–99). Numerous local and visiting quartets perform in auditoriums at the Ethical Society and the Sheldon, a concert hall used primarily for chamber music and solo recitals.

In 1840 the St Louis Sacred Music Society was founded, probably due to the encouragement of Johann Heinrich Weber, who arrived in 1834 with an extensive collection of choral music. Other choral organizations flourished: the St Louis Oratorio Society (founded by Charles Balmer in 1846), St Louis Choral Society (1880–1907), Pageant Choral Society (an offshoot of the Pageant and Masque of 1914; see below), Choral Art Society, St Louis A Cappella Choir (1929) and Bach Society of St Louis (from 1942).

The ballad opera The Agreeable Surprise (1781, including music by Samuel Arnold), given in 1817, was the first musical play performed in St Louis; the production by a local stock company of Auber's Masaniello (La muette de Portici, 1828) in 1830 was the first grand opera. Visiting companies presented French, German and Italian opera throughout the 19th century. Among the venues used were the Varieties Theatre, DeBar Opera House, Guy Golterman's Municipal Theater, his Garden Theater and the Municipal Auditorium Opera House (renamed Kiel Opera House and later Kiel Auditorium). The German Grand Opera Company presented the complete Ring cycle, conducted by Anton Seidl, at the Exposition Building in 1889. In addition to the Metropolitan from New York, opera companies from Boston, Chicago, Philadelphia and elsewhere visited during the early 20th century.

The Louisiana Purchase Exposition of 1904 (also known as St Louis World's Fair), which lasted 185 days, featured many musical activities. Because of the poor reception accorded orchestral concerts and Wagner's operas at the World's Columbian Exposition in Chicago in 1893, it was decided to emphasize concerts by bands. Besides daily concerts by local and internationally known bands (those of Sousa and Innes and the Garde Républicaine, among others), there were numerous choral and orchestral concerts. An organ, probably the largest in the world at that time, was installed in Festival Hall (cap. 3000), where daily recitals were given by Alexandre Guilmant and others. Although ragtime was flourishing (see §2 below), performances of it were allowed only outside the principal exposition area.



In 1914 the Pageant and Masque of St Louis, celebrating the 150th anniversary of the founding of the city, was produced in Forest Park with a cast of 7000 and an audience estimated at 500,000. This led to the formation of the St Louis Municipal Opera Association (MUNY), which has given summer seasons of operettas, musical comedies and (occasionally) opera performances since 1919, when the outdoor St Louis Municipal Opera Theatre (cap. 11,475) opened. It has also given some winter productions at the Fox Theater (cap. 4503), designed by C. Howard Crane and built in 1929, which closed in 1978 and after renovation was reopened in 1982. The Opera Theatre of Saint Louis was founded in 1976 with Richard Gaddes as general director; in 1978 Colin Graham became artistic director and in 1985 Charles MacKay succeeded Gaddes as general director. After using various small theatres and college halls, the company took the Loretto-Hilton Auditorium at Webster University as its permanent venue. Since 1976 the Saint Louis SO has served as its orchestra. Notable performances have included Britten's Albert Herring (1976; televised in 1979), Martín y Soler's L'arbore di Diana (in English as Tree of Chastity, 1978) and Weber-Mahler's Die drei Pintos (in English, 1979), and the premières of Stephen Paulus's The Village Singer (1979), The Postman always Rings Twice (1982) and The Woodlanders (1985), and Minoru Miki's Jōruri (1985), all of which were commissioned. In 1983 the Opera Theatre of Saint Louis was the first American opera company to appear at the Edinburgh International Festival.

Composers born in St Louis include Alfred G. Robyn (1860–1935), Ernest Richard Kroeger (1862–1934), Albert Stoessel (1894–1943) and Ben Weber (1916–79).

2. Ragtime, blues and jazz. The city's position at the confluence of routes from New Orleans to Chicago or Minneapolis and St Paul, and from Kansas City to the East, meant that a wide range of vernacular traditions converged there. Most of the great ragtime pianists and composers were active there after about 1890. Although ragtime was excluded from the Louisiana Purchase Exposition (1904), several ragtime composers were attracted to St Louis at this time for contests in the tenderloin district. This gave rise to such compositions as Scott Joplin's The Cascades. Other important figures were James Scott, Tom Turpin (who owned the Rosebud Club), Charlie Turpin, Arthur Marshall, Artie Matthews, Louis Chauvin, Scott Hayden, Charley Thompson, Robert Hampton, Joe Jordan, Charlie Warfield, Sam Patterson, Charles Hunter and Willie Anderson. Many of their compositions were published by John Stark & Son. The pianist and ragtime historian Trebor Jay Tichenor and the St Louis Ragtimers continue this local heritage. In 1965 the annual National Ragtime Festival was initiated in St Louis.

Blues, particularly the boogie-woogie style of piano playing, flourished and developed in St Louis. W.C. Handy had heard the blues performed on the riverfront in 1892, and composed his famous St. Louis Blues (see illustration) in 1914. Hundreds of blues performers from nearby states settled in St Louis, including the pianists 'Blackmouth', Son Long and Joe Cross, and the guitarists Dudlow Joe, Son Ryan and David Perchfield. The blues tradition has continued with such performers as Henry Spaulding, 'Speckled Red' Perryman, Robert Nighthawk, J.B. Hutto, Leroy Pierson and Henry Townsend.

Although St Louis did not develop an individual jazz style, it became the home of many important jazzmen. It was the organizational centre for the influential orchestras employed by the Streckfus Line aboard the riverboats SS Capitol and SS St Paul, for which Fate Marable recruited many of the most talented players from New Orleans and Chicago, including Louis Armstrong and Henry 'Red' Allen. Other early leaders were the trumpeters Charles Creath, Dewey Jackson and Oliver Cobb, and the pianist Eddie Johnson. Notable among the many venues have been Jazzland (from 1919), the Plantation Club, the Humming Bird Club and Tune Town, as well as the Castle and Arcadia ballrooms. The principal early bands included the St Louis Peacock Charleston Orchestra and the Original St Louis Crackerjacks, followed by the Jeter-Pillars Band (1930s) and George Hudson's Big Band (from 1942). Leading jazz musicians from the area include the clarinettist PeeWee Russell and the trumpeters Clark Terry and Miles Davis.

Sheet-music cover of W.C. Handy's 'St. Louis Blues', first published in 1914

3. Publishers and education. Music publishers active in St Louis, important both in the Midwest and nationally, have included Nathaniel Phillips (1839), the Balmer & Weber Music House (1848–1907), Kunkel Brothers (Charles and Jacob; 1868–1934), Adam and Oliver Shattinger (1876–1958), John Stark & Sons (*c*1900–10), the Art Publication Society (from 1912), Magna Music and the Concordia Publishing House.

Several colleges and conservatories of music were founded in St Louis in the 19th century and the early 20th, notably the Beethoven Conservatory of Music (1871–1936), Strassberger's Conservatory of Music (1891–1938), the Kroeger School of Music (1904–61) and the St Louis Institute of Music (1924–70). Those that have remained active include Washington University (Gaylord Music Library holds the Ernst C. Krohn Collection), St Louis University (established 1818), Webster University, Fontbonne College, the University of Missouri, St Louis, and the St Louis Conservatory and School of the Arts (CASA; founded 1872 by Charles Kunkel; closed 1993; taken over as the School of the Saint Louis SO).

JAMES M. BURK

Saint-Luc, Jacques de (b Ath, bap. 19 Sept 1616; d Vienna, *c*1710). Flemish lutenist and composer. In 1639 he was invited to Brussels to perform villancicos at court, and two years later he was appointed as an instrumentalist there. In 1641 his portrait (now lost) was painted by Gérard Seghers. By 1647 he was living in Paris, but while he no doubt appeared before the young Louis XIV and his court he was never a musician-in-ordinary to the king, as he later claimed. With the promise of 'a good post awaiting him', he returned to Brussels in October 1647; his name appears from then on in the accounts of Archduke Léopold-Guillaume. On 15 June 1658 he married Isabelle de Lagrenée. Their several children included two sons, Jacques-Alexandre (b 1663) and Laurent (b 1669); contrary to what has often been stated, there is no evidence that either son was a musician. During his years in Brussels Saint-Luc corresponded and exchanged compositions with Constantin Huygens, whom he had met in Paris, perhaps in 1647. Saint-Luc and his family were still in Brussels in August 1684, but nothing is known of his whereabouts after that date until 1700, when, on a visit from Vienna, he took part in a performance in Berlin on the occasion of the marriage of Princess Louise Dorothée of Brandenburg and Prince Frederick of Hesse-Cassel, the future king of Sweden.

According to his biographers, Saint-Luc was in the service of Prince Eugene of Savoy in Vienna from 1700 to 1708, which would explain why he is described as an 'officer' of the imperial army on title-pages of his compositions published in Amsterdam in 1707 and 1708. He had presumably purchased a commission, but that he was officially attached to Prince Eugene remains a hypothesis based only on the number of works he dedicated to him. He did, in fact, commemorate with equal enthusiasm events in which the prince played no part, in pieces such as La proclamation du roi Charles III d'Espagne and La prise de Barcelone in 1705 or La réduction de Naples in 1707. Two allemandes, Le prince de LKW and La fête de la naissance de monseigneur le prince de Lokowis, together with a march, La fête du nom de S.A. monseigneur le prince de Lokowis, evoke another, more likely patron. Prince Lobkowitz had in his library at Raudnitz numerous pieces by Saint-Luc, manuscripts which are now in Prague. A piece associated with the composer's last years commemorates the taking of Lille in December 1708. Saint-Luc, then aged 92, must have died soon after, but his reputation was kept alive in his native land: in the preface to his Recueil de pièces de guitare (1729), Jean-Baptiste Castillon recalled him as one who 'enjoyed a great reputation and played the guitar with immense skill'.

Saint-Luc left almost 200 pieces for solo lute. He also sketched a lute concerto, wrote a minuet for guitar and transcribed pieces of his own for lute, violin and bass. He may be seen as an alternative to the French lute school of the later 17th century represented by the Gallot family, Charles Mouton and Robert de Visée. Like them, he showed a predilection for grouping dances into suites consisting of prelude, allemande, courante, sarabande and gigue, and for filling out the canvas with other dances (bourrées and gavottes) and with titled pieces (e.g. Marche des Grecs, Le bourgeois gentilhomme). But unlike his French contemporaries, Saint-Luc did not give himself up entirely to the delights of the style brisé (present in his preludes). He sacrificed the harmonies of the style brisé to a finely chiselled melodic design and a quest for sonorous effects. He did not always achieve a harmonious marriage of these elements: some dances are marked by an entirely functional rigidity. Other pieces, however, are true miniatures which captivate the listener, and there are also works on an unusually large scale which show the concern for structure, the careful composition and the melodic inspiration that make Saint-Luc a key figure in the history of lute music of the 17th and 18th centuries. Many pieces reflect his taste for the opera, court ballet, Italian commedia dell'arte, French comedy and, especially, the motley world of the strolling players.

MANUEL COUVREUR, PHILIPPE VENDRIX

Saint-Marcoux, Micheline Coulombe (b Notre-Dame-de-la-Doré, 9 Aug 1938; d Montreal, 2 Feb 1985). Canadian composer. She studied music at the Ecole Vincent-d'Indy with Claude Champagne and obtained a premier prix in composition at the Conservatoire de Musique du Québec à Montréal (1967). Among her teachers were Gilles Tremblay and Clermont Pépin. In 1967 she was the first woman to win the Prix d'Europe in composition with her work Modulaire. From 1968 to 1971 she undertook a course in electro-acoustic music with Schaeffer at the Groupe de Recherches Musicales in Paris. In 1969 she founded, with five composers from other countries, the Groupe International de Musique Electroacoustique de Paris (GIMEP) which gave concerts in Europe, South America and Canada until 1973. She returned in 1971 to Quebec where, along with the percussionists Guy Lachapelle and Robert Leroux, she founded the ensemble Polycousmie which mixed electro-acoustics with percussion and dance. Her work Episode II was written for one of its concerts. Also in 1971 she became a teacher at the Conservatoire de Musique du Québec à Montréal. Throughout her career, she contributed actively to the promotion of contemporary music in Quebec and to its appreciation through her articles, lectures and broadcasts. Her premature death was the result of a brain tumour.

She first started writing in a post-serial style, of which Evocations doréanes (1964) is an example. In some of her later works, she was inspired by Quebec poets such as Nicole Brossard (Alchera), Noël Audet (Makazoti) and Paul Chamberland (Ishuma). Many of her compositions, such as Transit (1984), are based on chosen intervals that lead to the elaboration of other parameters.

I. General

1. History. 2. The manuscripts.

1. HISTORY. Among the French abbeys that from the 9th century to the 12th were centres of musical and poetic activity, none has left so rich a store of musical material as St Martial de Limoges, founded in 848 at the site of the tomb of St Martial, first Bishop of Limoges (3rd century). In the late 10th century a legend grew up claiming the saint's apostolicity; fervently supported by the monastery's chronicler, ADÉMAR DE CHABANNES (d 1034), the apostolicity was proclaimed by the councils of Limoges (1028) and Bourges (1031), beset by controversy but nevertheless increasing the abbey's prestige. Two significant factors mark the period 930–1130: the flowering of the Aquitanian school of poets and composers, and, towards the end of the period, the rise of Aquitanian polyphony. Despite the efforts of a few exceptional men, including the historian Bernard Itier (d 1224), a long decline began in the early 13th century; the monastery was secularized in 1535, dissolved in 1791 and demolished in 1792.

Beyond its artistic production, the importance of the abbey for music history owes much to accidental circumstances. Over the centuries the monastic library was fortunate to have suffered fewer depredations and sacks than the great northern French abbeys, and also, during its most prosperous period, to have been in the care of several librarians with a rare zeal for collecting. Thus the abbey became a repository of southern French liturgical manuscripts. The manuscripts were sold in 1730 to the Bibliothèque Royale, thus escaping dispersal and destruction during the French Revolution.

2. THE MANUSCRIPTS. The St Martial manuscripts contain the richest surviving collection of West Frankish tropes, proses, sequentiae, prosulas and versus. They are listed below together with the other surviving Aquitanian chant books to 1200 (those marked with an asterisk are not from the monastery library). With regard to the dates and places of origin (shown in parentheses), it should be noted that many manuscripts are composite, additions being made subsequently at different times and in different places. In some cases the decisions about St Martial's apostolicity (1028–31) provide a useful basis for dating: earlier manuscripts or sources from outside St Martial have the Mass Statuit for the feast of the saint; after 1028 the Mass Probavit was instituted. Older sources, whether from St Martial or elsewhere, were often altered to conform to the new liturgy, and these show erasures and cancellations. A few manuscripts remained unaltered, either because they were no longer in use in the service or because they were acquired purely as library items.

The group includes six graduals (F-AI 44/1, GB-Lbl Harl.4951, F-Pn lat.776, 780, 903, 1132), two antiphoners (F-AI 44/2, Pn lat.1085), one orational (Pn lat.1154) and four collections of polyphonic verse songs (GB-Lbl Add.36881, F-Pn lat.1139, 3459, 3719). The remaining manuscripts are tropers or sequentiaries, containing various combinations of tropes, proses, sequentiae, prosulas and a number of other chants including most often Mass Ordinary chants, acclamations, processional and Fraction antiphons, the Holy Week Offices, and the solo chants of the Mass (inventories in Chailley, 1957; Spanke, 1930–32; Emerson, 1962). Their notation ranges from the primitive neumes of F-Pn lat.1154 (fig.1) and 1240 to the fully developed Aquitanian point notation of the 11th century and an incipient square notation in the 12th (see STAFF, fig.2). The breaking of neumes into separate points led at an early stage to reasonably good diastematy, so that even late 10th-century sources often have transcribable melodies. Successive notation of polyphonic parts in Pn lat.1139 (see fig.2 below) has obscured the number of monophonic pieces in this manuscript and led some scholars to assume, incorrectly (see Fuller, 1971), that the notation represents monophonic arrangements of polyphonic works.

II. Monophony

1. Trope, prose, sequentia, prosula. 2. Verse songs. 3. Mass and Office chants, processional antiphons.

1. TROPE, PROSE, 'SEQUENTIA', PROSULA. The main corpus of the earliest St Martial troper (F-Pn lat.1240) already contained a well-developed cycle of Proper tropes, a collection of Gloria tropes, prosulas to the alleluia and offertory, and an incipient proser. No other Ordinary tropes and no sequentiae appear in the original redaction. The troper included every category of Proper trope found in the later Aquitanian manuscripts. The proses, all of which show wide concordances in later sources, are fully developed works of the typical double-versicle structure, with some assonance as well as musical rhyme (the ending of all versicles with the same cadence), and often with a single versicle at the beginning and end of the piece. There is evidence that part of this repertory, particularly the Proper tropes, came to St Martial from the north (Evans: 'Northern French Elements', 1970). The Gloria tropes also represent an international repertory, but they already show the characteristics of extreme centonization and the addition of wandering versicles typical of later Aquitanian versions.

The late 10th- and early 11th-century sources indicate an enormous increase in the repertory. Sequentiaries, sometimes coordinated with a proser (Pn lat.887), made their appearance, together with systematic collections of Kyrie verses, Sanctus and Agnus tropes, and prosulas to the Regnum tuum solidum and the Fabricae mundi melismas, as well as a few purely melodic elaborations of the introits and their doxologies, usually connected with textual tropes. In the case of the proses, the writing of new texts for old tunes was responsible for much of the increase. A few of the sequentiae included short kernel verses which were retained when the rest of the words were omitted in the sequentiaries (see Stäblein, 1961); in these cases the new proses incorporated the kernel verses within their text. A different process obtained in the Proper tropes, where older texts were provided with new melodies. Often the replaced melodies seem to have been non-Aquitanian, for they survive in northern tropers or in some of the Aquitanian manuscripts that show conflationary contamination or northern influences (e.g. Pn 1240, 1118, 887). It is noteworthy that the later tropers from St Martial itself show the least amount of non-Aquitanian influence within this repertory.

Although the liturgical changes in the feast of St Martial gave rise to a few new pieces in about 1030, the repertory had become stagnant by this date. The late 11th-century additions formed a wholly different repertory, mostly of verse songs, rhymed tropes to the Benedicamus Domino closely related in style to the verse songs, a few Kyrie verses, Sanctus and Agnus tropes, and new-style proses including, at a later date, some from the Victorine tradition.

See also PROSULA; SEQUENCE (i); and TROPE (i).

2. VERSE SONGS. The early Aquitanian repertory of verse songs (including conductus and planctus) has an international rather than a Limousin character. The collection in F-Pn lat.1154 includes metra from Boethius's De consolatione philosophiae, poems by Gottschalk of Aachen and Paulinus of Aquileia as well as anonymous works of Spanish (Versus de die iudicii, f.121) and possibly north Italian (Planctus karoli, f.132) origin. The only certain Limousin piece is the prose Concelebremus sacram (f.142*v*). Although not all pieces are notated, Pn lat.1154 often has the only or the earliest notated version of several of them. Poetically they range from simple abecedarian hymns to verse songs with one or two refrains. Musical settings are often strophic, so that only the first stanza and the refrain are provided with neumes.

Although such pieces as Theodulf of Orleans's Gloria laus et honor or the Improperia for Good Friday were often labelled versus in the tropers (Pn lat.1240, f.21*v*, lat.1120, f.15*v*), the true verse song repertory of the late 10th century and the early 11th consists of a few works scattered throughout the manuscripts. Notable among them is the Versus de Sancto Martyrio (Pn lat.909, f.5), which goes beyond the double-versicle structure of the proses and has a four-versicle pattern, in effect rendering it a sacred lai. A few secular lyrics also found their way into the tropers, for example, Iam dulcis amica (Pn lat.1118, ff.246–7). In contrast to the international repertory of Pn lat.1154, the late 10th- and early 11th-century Aquitanian verse songs appear to have been a purely local repertory.

Both prose-like works and strophic verse songs are present in the late Limousin manuscripts. Though frequently set polyphonically, they are poetically similar to the pieces of Pn 1154. The most important difference lies in the use of rhythmic and rhymed verse, and in the presence in several of the texts of Provençal elements. The sponsus play in Pn lat.1139 (f.53) is essentially a cycle of verse songs (see MEDIEVAL DRAMA, §II, 1). The influence of this repertory upon later secular music has been rightly emphasized by Handschin (1929; 1930). The so-called tropes to the Benedicamus Domino in the late Aquitanian sources show no essential difference from the other verse songs beyond the incorporation of the liturgical formula in their texts.

3. MASS AND OFFICE CHANTS, PROCESSIONAL ANTIPHONS. Except for the facsimile publication of the St Yrieix Gradual (F-Pn lat.903: PalMus, 1st ser., xiii, 1925/R), the study of tropes and proses has taken precedence over that of Mass and Office chants in the St Martial sources. Recent studies of Aquitanian graduals, however, reveal a substantial number of non-standard chants for older as well as new feasts. Particularly notable is the large collection of new alleluias in Pn lat.903, which, structurally, form a very homogeneous group. Among the non-standard works there are also a considerable number of what seem to be old Gallican survivals (see GALLICAN CHANT, §4 see also Stäblein, 'Gallikanische Liturgie', MGG1).

The apostolicity proclamations (1028 and 1031) gave rise to new Offices, not only for St Martial but also for his companions Valeria and Austriclinianus; some of these Offices were written by Adémar de Chabannes (see Emerson, 1965). The processional antiphon repertory also shows traces of an indigenous Aquitanian tradition (see Roederer, 1974), although in about 1000 the Aquitanian versions of the antiphons began to be replaced by more widespread versions. The growth of the international antiphon repertory can be traced to sources originating at St Martial itself (Pn lat.1120 and 1121). There are, therefore, apparent cross-currents in the abbey's early 11th-century repertory: on the one hand there was a relatively restricted repertory of tropes and proses, almost completely devoid of the non-Aquitanian influences found in the earlier troper Pn lat.1240 and some of the manuscripts from outside St Martial; on the other hand, in the processional antiphons and other chant repertories (outside the music for the abbey's own local saints), Aquitanian versions were gradually rejected in favour of more widespread versions.

III. Polyphony

1. The repertory. 2. Style and form. 3. Interpretation.

1. THE REPERTORY. The term 'St Martial polyphony' is traditionally applied to a repertory of two-part music copied in Aquitanian neumes in the codices F-Pn lat.1139, 3549 and 3719 and GB-Lbl add.36881 (facs. with commentary by B. Gillingham, Ottawa, 1987). The music is more accurately designated Aquitanian polyphony, after its notational type, for although three of the codices were collected at the monastery of St Martial at Limoges by the early 13th century, there is no firm evidence that the surviving repertory originated there. The oldest layer of this polyphony, contained in F-Pn lat.1139 (fig.2) and in certain fascicles of Pn lat.3719, was copied about 1100. The latest layer (GB-Lbl add.36881) dates from the second half of the 12th century.

The total corpus of Aquitanian polyphony consists of some 70 pieces: 49 versus (see §II, 2), 12 proses (sequences), 2 prosae to responds, 3 plain Benedicamus Domino versicles, 2 prayers, a hymn and one epistle. The versus, which constitute over two thirds of the repertory, subdivide into one group of ordinary versus (29 pieces) and another of Benedicamus Domino versus (20 pieces). The latter typically conclude with the versicle Benedicamus Domino, or some variant of it. Apart from this difference, the two kinds of versus share a common musical and poetic style.

Both musically and textually the polyphonic Aquitanian versus appears to be the precursor of the polyphonic Parisian conductus. Like the conductus, its texts are rhymed, strophic, accentual poetry and deal predominantly with themes of the Incarnation and Virgin Birth appropriate to Christmastide. Similarly, its two voices are governed by principles of discant and may break into expansive melismas during the course of a piece. Two compositions, one the frequently printed Stirps Jesse, superficially resemble the motet in their combination of an active upper voice presenting a long poetic text with a slower lower voice that is a liturgical Benedicamus Domino melody. However, the nature and context of these pieces indicate that they are experimental Benedicamus Domino versus that have no historical connection with the motet either in procedure or in influence.

2. Style and form. The Aquitanian composers appear to have been among the first creators of polyphony to move from note-against-note texture to a florid counterpoint in which several notes in one voice, the upper, are matched against only one or two notes in the other (ex.1*a*). This florid style, though dramatically more ornate than earlier known polyphony, is more constrained than the spacious melismatic style of Notre Dame organa. Florid and note-against-note textures often occur side by side in one piece. The contrast frequently articulates some structural feature of the text or emphasizes the end of a poetic line or strophe in the versus. Some of the shorter versus are entirely note-against-note, or discantal, in setting, whereas others are florid throughout. The older proses and the prosae to responds maintain a quite florid polyphonic texture, but those with new-style rhymed poetic texts are more discantal.

The versus exhibit considerable variety in musical form, a reflection in part of their diverse poetic structures. Some are strophic, some are through-composed. Some are set in repeated phrases, sequence-style; others exhibit sporadic, unsystematic phrase repetition. The main phrases or divisions of a versus often conclude with an expansive melisma in both voices (ex.2). Such terminal melismas serve to clarify poetic structure and bear an obvious resemblance to the caudas of the Parisian conductus.

Contrapuntally, the two voices in Aquitanian polyphony are governed by general, but not entirely systematic, principles of contrary motion and perfect consonance. These two principles are most evident when the voices move note-against-note (ex.2) but also operate within florid style. Intervals of an octave, 5th, 4th or unison characteristically connect the ornate upper voice of a florid passage with the lower voice (see ex.1*b*). Substantial musical variants in florid voices found in more than one manuscript point to some degree of improvisatory flexibility in performance and to a process of oral transmission.

Certain stock contrapuntal figures permeate Aquitanian polyphony. These involve expansion or contraction from one perfect interval to another, as well as voice-crossing within the module of a 5th. Such figures are particularly prominent in terminal melismas where they often appear juxtaposed in a mosaic-like manner (ex.3). The interdependence of the voices in such passages indicates simultaneous, rather than successive, conception of the parts, and suggests training in standard patterns of two-voice improvisation.

3. Interpretation. Although uncertainties about pitch occur occasionally (especially in the earliest notated layers), for modern editors and performers the main question about Aquitanian polyphony concerns rhythmic interpretation. The Aquitanian neumes, originally used for monophony, do not specify durations and other essentials of rhythmic delivery, yet the two-part texture poses distinct problems of coordination, especially when a single syllable bears unequal numbers of notes in each voice. Except for note-against-note passages, syllable changes and some division strokes in the later sources, the notation has limited means to indicate specific alignment between the two parts; as a result, controversy over the possible solutions remains intense. Some scholars (Gillingham, Karp) argue for interpretation according to a modal or mensural system, and have edited the music accordingly. Others (Arlt, Crocker, Danckwardt, Fuller, van der Werf) argue that the music was performed in unsystematic, flexible rhythms that were guided by text structure and delivery, and by arrivals on consonant intervals. Among the factors cited in support of this view are the nature of the notation, variants in transmission more extreme than those normal for music in modal rhythm, the use of division lines in the later sources, and uncertainty over when modal rhythm was codified (even in Parisian circles). Recorded realizations of Aquitanian polyphony by informed scholar-performers (e.g. Marcel Pérès, Dominique Vellard and the Sequentia ensemble) should be regarded as equivalent to scholarly editions. They demonstrate that performance in regular, flexible rhythms is both practical and aesthetically effective.

Sainton, Philip (Prosper) (b Arques-la-Bataille, Seine-Maritime, 10 Nov 1891; d Petersfield, Hampshire, 2 Aug 1967). English composer and viola player. The grandson of celebrated 19th-century musicians, he studied at the RAM with Corder and Tertis. During World War I he worked as a chemist, primarily in the Middle East. After the war he became principal viola in the Queen's Hall Orchestra, a member of the London String Quartet (from 1929) and principal viola of the BBC SO (1930–44). He established his reputation as a composer with two orchestral Sea Pictures, which he conducted at the Proms in 1923. He is particularly remembered, however, for his impressionistic orchestral tone poem The Island (1939); first heard during World War II, it enjoyed a brief popularity in the late 1940s and was recorded in 1993. His success with sea music led to a score for John Huston's film Moby Dick (1956), which, reconstructed by John W. Morgan and William T. Stromberg, was recorded in 1997. He also orchestrated a number of scores by the South African composer J.S. Gerber. His surviving output is small (several of the earlier works appear to have been destroyed).

LEWIS FOREMAN

Sainton, Prosper (Philippe Catherine) (b Toulouse, 5 June 1813; d London, 17 Oct 1890). French violinist and composer. He was educated in Toulouse and, from December 1831, at the Paris Conservatoire, where he studied the violin under Habeneck and won a premier prix in 1834. For the next two years he played in the orchestras of the Société des Concerts and the Opéra. He then made an extended tour through Italy, Germany, Austria, Russia, Finland, Sweden, Denmark and Spain, with great success. In 1840 he was appointed violin professor at the Toulouse Conservatoire. Having visited England in 1844 he returned in 1845 to settle in London, although he was to continue giving concerts in France, and take up an appointment as professor at the RAM.

He took part in performances of the Beethoven Quartet Society, the Musical Union, the Quartet Association (which he helped to found in 1852) and the Popular Concerts; and he led the orchestras of the Philharmonic Society (1846–54), the Royal Italian Opera at Covent Garden (1847–71), Her Majesty's Theatre (1871–80) and the Sacred Harmonic Society (from 1848), sometimes acting as deputy conductor to Costa. From 1848 to 1855 he was conductor of the state band and violin soloist to the Queen. For many years he was leader in provincial performances, including those of the Birmingham Festivals. At the opening of the 1862 International Exhibition Sainton conducted the performance of Sterndale Bennett's

Ode. His farewell concert took place at the Royal Albert Hall on 25 June 1883.

Among his many pupils were Weist-Hill, F. Amor, A.C. Mackenzie, A. Burnett, Gabrielle Vaillant and W. Sutton. His compositions (including two violin concertos) are primarily virtuoso showpieces, often fantasies on themes from operas by Verdi and Donizetti. In 1860 he married Charlotte Dolby.

Sainton-Dolby [née Dolby], Charlotte (Helen) (b London, 17 May 1821; d London, 18 Feb 1885). English contralto, teacher and composer. She studied from 1832 at the RAM and was awarded a King's Scholarship in 1837. In 1840, while still a student, she was one of the founder-members of the Royal Society of Female Musicians. Her début as a soloist was at a Philharmonic Society concert on 14 April 1842. Mendelssohn, impressed by her singing, obtained an engagement for her during the winter of 1845–6 at the Leipzig Gewandhaus Concerts (where she first appeared on 25 October 1845), dedicated the English edition of his Six Songs (op.57) to her, and wrote the contralto part of Elijah with her in mind. Following her Leipzig success she toured in France and the Netherlands and was soon in great demand as a ballad and oratorio singer throughout Britain. In 1860 she married the violinist Prosper Sainton and ten years later retired from public performance, turning instead to composition and teaching. In 1872 she published a Tutor for English Singers and opened a Vocal Academy, which gave frequent London concerts often including performances of her own music.

Sainton-Dolby started publishing her many simple ballads and arrangements in the 1850s. After her retirement she also turned to the more ambitious genre of the cantata. The most widely performed of her four cantatas was The Legend of St Dorothea (1876), a large-scale retelling of the story of the early Christian martyr.

Shortly after her death the RAM founded a scholarship in her memory.

1. The 18th century.

(i) Sacred music. From its foundation St Petersburg was at the fore of Russian musical culture. Under Peter the Great art assumed a new national significance, and the role of music was reinforced, in the church, at court and in everyday urban life.

Singers and choristers from all parts of Russia, but primarily from the province of Novgorod and Ukraine, with their firmly established traditions, converged on the new capital. Singing was an obligatory skill for all clergymen, and the court clergy included singers who were under the control of a head chorister. During the 18th century the great Russian Orthodox tradition of singing was maintained above all by the Synodal Choir (founded in 1721), which consisted of 44 adult singers and, from 1767, when the choir moved to Moscow, a number of children. Being attached to the royal court, the Synodal Choir also participated in performances of secular music.

The singing of monks from the monastic brotherhoods of the city churches formed an important part of St Petersburg's choral culture. Monastic singing, which was perceived as a reflection of the singing of angels, was based on canticles taken from the obikhod of the largest monasteries in Old Russia (including the Trinity and St Sergius, Kirillo-Belozersky, Solovetsky and Chudov monasteries). The choir of the bishop of St Petersburg took part in state ecclesiastical ceremonies, where the divine services (for which magnificent polyphonic pieces known as partesnïy were composed on liturgical and non-liturgical texts) acquired a secular character. For this reason, the choir drew on Ukrainian and Belarusian singing styles influenced by contemporary European developments.

The court choir (gosudarevï pevchiye d'yaki – literally, 'ruler's singing clerks') consisted of the finest singers from the St Petersburg clergy as well as choristers recruited from various regions of the country. Its history can be traced back to the court choir founded in Moscow in 1479. In 1703 the choir was moved to St Petersburg, and in 1713 it was decreed that it should take part in state ceremonies. In the 1720s it numbered some 20 singers. At the start of the century the main function of the choir was to sing in court church services in the presence of the tsar; Peter the Great, who possessed a powerful voice and could sing the services from memory, would often take part himself. The choristers also participated in the Christmas and New Year ceremonies, when, headed by the tsar dressed in mock-ecclesiastical attire, they revived the ancient Russian traditions of skomoroshestvo ('laughter and merriment').

In 1753 the number of choristers was increased to 100, and from 1763 the choir was given the title Pridvornaya Pevcheskaya Kapella (Court Chapel Choir). Its chorus master (from 1753) and director (from 1763 to 1795) was Mark Poltoratsky, who was also the first Russian artist to sing on the operatic stage in the city alongside famous Italians. The choristers received their preliminary training at Glukhov in Ukraine and continued their education at the court chapel. The choir, which was called upon to sing at rituals outside the church and at court ceremonies, was exposed to the influence of West European secular culture. From the mid-18th century the choristers of the court choir, together with their head choristers and psalm readers, took part in theatrical productions and private concerts of chamber music. From the 1770s they appeared in public concerts, performing such works as C.H. Graun's Te Deum, Pergolesi's Stabat mater and Jommelli's La passione di Gesù Cristo (all in 1779). Choral groups also took part in operas (for example, in the première of Paisiello's Nitteti in 1777). In a decree of 1783 Catherine II (ruled 1762–96) stressed the importance of secular music for the court singers, who in time received court ranks and secular privileges. In 1800 Dmytro Bortnyans'ky (director 1779–1825) released the choir from its obligation to take part in opera performances; it was replaced by a newly formed opera chorus.

Singing in St Petersburg was taught in special schools set up for the children of the clergy in accordance with a decree of Peter the Great, and then at seminaries, where singing was one of the most important elements. One such seminary was that of Feofan Prokopovich where, besides traditional music teaching, the pupils studied instrumental music and staged plays with music.

(ii) Bellringing and ceremonial music. The traditional Orthodox ringing of bells gave rise to a specific St Petersburg 'bell polyphony'. Some of the city's churches had ensembles of bells: by the beginning of the 19th century, the St Peter and St Paul Cathedral (consecrated in 1757) had three groups, each with four bells; the church of the Assumption of the Virgin, near the Tuchkov Bridge (1761), had seven bells; and the cathedral of St Nicholas the Miracle-Worker (1760) five large and eight small bells.

With the appearance of new ecclesiastical and state ceremonies ('victory days'), bells became a symbol of imperial power. The ringing of bells was combined with trumpets, drums, cannonades and the chanting of prayers in church ceremonies celebrating military victories or peace treaties, as in the festivities marking the signing of the Peace of Neustadt with the Swedes in October 1721. During the reign of Paul I (1796–1801) these lavish ecclesiastical and military ceremonies became an integral feature of public life.

Celebrations such as those in honour of the capture of Schlüsselburg (1702), the victory at Poltava (1709) and the Peace of Neustadt required new forms of community music-making. Trumpets, oboes, kettledrums and large woodwind ensembles were used for open-air festivals, and in 1711 a special decree declared that wind bands comprising nine 'oboists' (the generic term for a company musician) and 16 drummers should be introduced into infantry regiments. From the 1730s the military bands, consisting of clarinets, transverse flutes, recorders, bassoons and horns, supplemented by trumpets and kettledrums, played battle pieces and marches whose titles reflected events in Russian history. Military music played by regimental musicians from the high bell towers was a regular form of entertainment in the city.

The genre known as the kant established itself during the era of Peter the Great. This was a three-part song glorifying the might and military prowess of the new Russia; its poetry contained echoes of the Russian classical ode, while the music fused features of the znamennïy chant with Russian, Ukrainian and Polish lyricism.

In the first half of the 18th century triumphal military marches (the symbol of military strength) and solemn courtly processions (the symbol of imperial power) were held along the straight avenue of the Nevsky Prospekt, stretching from the Admiralty Building to the Aleksandr Nevsky Monastery. The entry into the capital of the Empress Yelizaveta Petrovna in 1742 was a particularly splendid affair, accompanied by choral singing, trumpeters and oboists playing on balconies, triumphal arches and bell towers, wind bands, drums, cannonades and bells, whose ringing expressed the meaning of the various stages of the procession.

Fireworks (which played an important role in festivals under Peter the Great) and excursions on barges were frequently accompanied by horns and trumpets. In 1751 Jan Mares assembled a unique orchestra of hunting horns for Count S.K. Narïshkin (after 1755 this became a court orchestra), which won popularity for its playing of complex four-part compositions.

(iii) Concerts. Under Catherine II a decree made it compulsory for the aristocracy to attend musical and theatrical entertainments. For state occasions, birthdays and namedays, court musicians were required to compose operas, oratorios or concertos. Wealthy patrons of the arts (including Prince A.D. Menshikov, Count G.A. Stroganov, the attorney-general P.A. Yaguzhinsky and Admiral F.M. Apraksin) founded their own instrumental ensembles, employing both serf musicians and foreign artists. They even vied with one another, giving concerts in the grand halls of their houses and palaces. Concerts were held during Lent, when the carnivals, balls and masquerades had finished and foreign musicians had arrived in the city. Paying concerts were also given in the houses of the nobility. The first advertisement for a public concert appeared in the Sankt-Peterburgskiye vedomosti in 1746; and from then on regular public concerts were given. During the reign of Catherine there were also series of concerts (e.g. the series of oratorios given in 1779); and by the end of the century concerts were also held in St Petersburg theatres. Among the Russian performers who appeared in concerts in the city were the virtuoso violinist Ivan Khandoshkin and the singer and actress Elizaveta Sandunova. The first concert organizations in Russia were formed in St Petersburg during the 1770s: in 1772 a large number of musical amateurs organized a Muzïkal'nïy Klub to perform chamber and orchestral music. Later on this came to include professional musicians, who helped to create the Novoye Muzïkal'noye Obshchestvo (New Music Society) in 1778.

(iv) Opera. When it came to opera, St Petersburg had a clear advantage over Moscow. It was geographically and culturally closer to Western Europe, and the court welcomed foreign troupes, whose repertories usually included the finest contemporary works. The first theatre in St Petersburg was constructed in 1722–3, at a time when Italian singers were beginning to visit the city. An opera house attached to the Winter Palace was built in 1734, but burnt down in 1749. In 1730–31 and 1733–5 Italian troupes visited the city, and in 1736 a troupe headed by Francesco Araja marked the birthday of the Empress Anna Ioanovna with a staging of his opera seria La forza dell'amore e dell'odio. The same year the Italian court opera was created under Araja, although it included Russian singers and orchestral players. From 1729 French troupes also visited the city. In 1756 the first Russian public theatre was built, at the Golovkin house on Vasil'yevsky Island; under the direction of Aleksandr Sumarokov a Russian troupe of singers and actors was created there. Besides its weekly productions for the court, the Italian opera buffa troupe of G.B. Locatelli performed at the so-called Malïy (or Derevyannïy) Teatr (Little, or Wooden, Theatre) in St Petersburg's central park from 1757 to 1759. In 1771 an English operatic troupe visited the city, performing works by Dibdin and Arne. Catherine also maintained a French theatre whose comédies mêlées d'ariettes were the model for the earliest efforts by Russian composers. A number of Russian aristocrats opened their own private theatres in the capital, and there was even a 'salon' theatre in the palace of Paul I.

By the 1780s opera had become a court craze. Two theatres were specially constructed or refurbished for it: the Hermitage Theatre in the Winter Palace (renovated in 1783–4 by the architect Quarenghi); and the Bol'shoy Kamennïy Teatr (Great Stone Theatre), built in 1783 (fig.1). Operas were also performed in French, Italian and Russian at the palaces of Gatchina and Pavlovsk. In 1777 the Malïy Teatr was acquired by the German impresario Karl Knipper, who in 1779 renamed the establishment the Vol'nïy Teatr (Free Theatre) and engaged the court violinist Vasily Pashkevich as his music director. The first Russian Singspiel to be presented to a paying audience in the capital was Pashkevich's Neschast'ye ot karetï ('Misfortune from a Coach') in December 1779. At its height under Catherine the Great the court opera in St Petersburg rivalled the best theatres in Europe, and a number of important premières, including Paisiello's Il barbiere di Siviglia, were given there.

From the mid-18th century famous European musicians began to visit St Petersburg. After his tours with the Italian opera troupe, Araja returned and worked for the court stage (1742–59); in 1755 he composed music to the first Russian opera libretto Tsefal i Prokris. From the middle of the century leading Italian musicians occupied the posts of court conductor and court composer: Manfredini (1758–69), Galuppi (1765–8), Traetta (1768–75), Paisiello (1776–84), Canobbio (1779–1822), Cimarosa (1787–91), Sarti (1784–7, 1791–1801), and Martín y Soler (1790–94, 1796–1806). For the court they also composed keyboard music and other instrumental works. As head of the Prince Potyomkin's private cappella, Sarti wrote several cantatas to mark Russian military victories (including Slava v vïshnïkh Bogu ('Glory to God in the Highest') celebrating the end of the war with Turkey in 1792). Galuppi wrote music for the Orthodox church while in St Petersburg.

It was against this background that Russian composers living in St Petersburg developed their art. Besides Pashkevich, composers at the forefront of musical life during the 1770s and 80s included the opera composers Y.I. Fomin, D.S. Bortnyans'ky (a pupil of Galuppi) and M.S. Berezovs'ky (the last two were also distinguished composers of sacred music), the gusli player and folksong collector V.F. Trutovsky and the virtuoso violinist Ivan Khandoshkin.

2. 1800–1918.

(i) Concerts and music societies. In the early 19th century Russian music, with its centre in St Petersburg, entered a period of rich maturity. The work of Glinka, who lived in St Petersburg for much of his adult life, is inseparable from the development of the city's musical culture. His immediate predecessors, including Alyab'yev, Varlamov, Verstovsky, Davïdov, Cavos and Kozłowski, all lived in St Petersburg, and his younger contemporary Dargomïzhsky spent his whole life there. Tchaikovsky studied in the city and lived there until 1866. Dargomïzhsky formed a link between Glinka and the representatives of the St Petersburg-based 'The Five' – Balakirev, Borodin, Musorgsky and Rimsky-Korsakov, with Stasov as their literary champion.

From the beginning of the century the circle of those attending concerts in halls and private houses increased. Concerts were given in the palaces of Count Stroganov, Count Kushelyov-Bezborodko and the Wielhorski brothers (where the first Russian performances of Beethoven symphonies took place), in the gallery of the Anichkov Palace, the hall of the Page Corps, in the house of the Free Economic Society and elsewhere. Musical 'academies' were held in the house known until 1846 as the Engelhardt Hall. This became the centre of St Petersburg's concert life, and had an important influence on the formation of public taste.

Music was also performed in palaces outside the city (Tsarskoye selo, Gatchina, Peterhof, Oranienbaum). In the summer months concerts were given in the parks on the edge of the city, especially that in Pavlovsk (laid out in 1838). Here Johann Strauss appeared with his orchestra, first in 1849, then regularly between 1856 and 1865 with his brothers Josef and Eduard, and in 1869 with Josef). From the late 1830s summer concerts were popular at the spa of Novaya Derevnya. Military bands played in the city and in the suburbs; particularly notable were the concerts of the bandmaster and composer Fyodor Gaaze (1830–51).

In 1802 the Sankt-Peterburgskoye Filarmoncheskoye Obshchestvo (St Petersburg Philharmonic Society) was founded. It survived for 100 years, giving 205 symphony concerts in all, but only occasionally from 1890. In 1803 Haydn's The Seasons was performed by the society, which in 1808 awarded Haydn a medal. The Philharmonic Society did much to popularize Mozart's music, and on its initiative the première of Beethoven's Missa solemnis was given in St Petersburg in 1824 (a month before the first performance in Vienna). Among the foreign visitors who appeared with the Philharmonic Society were Liszt (1842, 1843), Clara and Robert Schumann (1844), Berlioz (1847, 1867–8), Wagner (1863) and the singer Pauline Viardot (1843–6, 1853). Foreign musicians who lived in St Petersburg for shorter or longer periods included John Field (1802–21); Maria Szymanowska (1822, 1827, 1828–31), who was given the title of court pianist; the German pianist and composer Adolf Henselt (1838–89); Anton Gerke, who taught Musorgsky, Tchaikovsky and Stasov; and the Bohemian pianist and composer Alexander Dreyschock who, after his triumphant concert tour of 1840 was later invited to become a professor at the St Petersburg Conservatory. Outstanding among Russian performers in St Petersburg was Aleksey L'vov (1798–1870), a brilliant concert violinist (who implacably opposed the new school of Paganini), director of the Court Chapel Choir for several years and the composer of, among other works, the Russian national anthem.

The takings from the Philharmonic Society concerts were often used for charitable causes, donated to the families of artists and musicians or to war invalids. Conductors who appeared frequently with the society during the 19th century included Konstantin Lyadov (father of the composer), Eduard Nápravník, Balakirev and Rimsky-Korsakov. From 1847 the orchestra, numbering 50–60 players, gave ten concerts each season under its regular conductor, Carl Schuberth.

The imperial court chapel choir took part in the concerts of the Philharmonic Society. Bortnyans'ky, the choir's director from 1796, was elected an honorary member of the Philharmonic Society in 1815 and appointed censor for sacred music in 1816. By a decree of the synod his arrangements of the services were imposed on all the churches. One of the court chapel choir's former pupils, Aleksandr Varlamov, was director from 1829 to 1832; from 1837 to 1839 its director was Glinka, and later directors included Grigory Lomakin (1848–61) and Balakirev (1883–94), who invited Rimsky-Korsakov to teach there. In 1840 a reform of the musical education of the choristers took place: Glinka and L'vov introduced an instrumental class, which in 1846 was supplemented by classes in choral direction.

Concerts of sacred and secular music were given annually from 1850 to 1872 by the choral cappella of Count D.N. Sheremet'yev, directed by the former serf Lomakin. In 1880 a choir was formed by Aleksandr Arkhangel'sky, who was the first to introduce female sopranos instead of boys into Orthodox church singing. Amateur choirs in the city pooled their resources to perform large-scale works (as in 1865 when Handel's Messiah was given with a 200-strong choir and an orchestra of 150) or to participate in important public events (for example, the concert of 1882 to collect funds for a monument to Glinka in Smolensk). Oratorios were frequently performed in the city during Lent.

Musical salons played an important role in the musical life of St Petersburg. These included the salons of the well-known critic Osip Senkovsky, the Wielhorski brothers, L'vov, Vasily Kologrivov, Vasily Botkin and others. In response to the increasing popularity of chamber music in the last third of the century, a chamber music society was established (1872–1917), which promoted the work of Russian composers. Between 1871 and 1883 the Russian Quartet was active in St Petersburg.

The 1850s and 60s were watershed years for Russian music: education became more widespread and the role of music grew accordingly. In 1859 Anton Rubinstein founded the Russkoye Muzïkal'noye Obshchestvo (Russian Music Society, RMO), which in 1869 became the Imperial Russian Music Society (IRMO). Until it closed in 1917 the society gave up to 20 concerts each year. From 1867 to 1869 the chief conductor was Balakirev, followed (1870–72) by Nápravník. With the financial support of the imperial family and patrons of the arts the RMO supported talented young composers, held competitions and opened branches in other cities of Russia; the local conservatories came under its jurisdiction. Leading St Petersburg artists appeared in the RMO's concerts, among them the pianists Anna Yesipova, Theodor Leschetizky, Vasily Safonov and Aleksandr Ziloti, the cellist Karl Davïdov and the violinist Leopold Auer.

Among foreign musicians to appear with the society were Saint-Saëns (1875) and Bülow (1885), both of whom wrote admiringly of the musical life of St Petersburg. In 1882 the court orchestra was founded under Hugo Varlich. Its main function was to provide music for ceremonial occasions at the tsar's court, although it also arranged private readings of new works.

During the 1880s and 90s Russian musicians, headed by Rimsky-Korsakov, gathered at the house of the wealthy patron Mitrofan Belyayev in order to promote the works of younger Russian composers, above all Glazunov and Lyadov. For this purpose Belyayev founded the Obshchedostupnïye Russkiye Simfonicheskiye Konsertï (Russian Public Symphony Concerts, 1885–1918), which in its first 25 years mounted 93 concerts featuring 680 works by 48 different composers. He also established the Glinkinskiye Premii (Glinka Prizes) for new Russian compositions (1884–1917), organized a series of quartet recitals (1891) and set up a publishing house in Leipzig in 1885.

In 1901 the Contemporary Music Society was formed, giving about five concerts each season. Members included the critics Karatïgin and Al'fred Nurok, the composers Ivan Krïzhanovsky and Val'ter Nuvel', and others. Stravinsky made his début with the society in 1907, and Prokofiev and Myaskovsky appeared the following year. Among the younger composers active in St Petersburg during these years were Lourié, Gnesin, Obukhov and Vïshnegradsky. The idea of 'sound continuum' was developed by Vïshnegradsky, who experimented with micro-intervals (he later devised a quarter-tone piano) and 'ultrachromatic' systems. A key role in the propagation of contemporary music in St Petersburg at the start of the 20th century was played by a new organization, the subscription Konsertï A. Ziloti (Ziloti Concerts, 1903–17), whose orchestral and chamber concerts featured, besides Ziloti himself, many well-known artists. These included Koussevitzky with his Moscow orchestra, Richard Strauss, Mahler, Reger, Schoenberg, Nikisch, Mottl, Mengelberg, Casals and others. In addition to the subscription concerts, Ziloti organized non-subscription orchestral concerts, chamber recitals, organ recitals at the Reformed Church, then (from 1912) Obshchedostupnïye Kontsertï (Popular Concerts), and finally, from 1915, Narodnïye Besplatnïye Kontsertï (People's Free Concerts). In addition to music by contemporary composers from Russia and abroad (including Debussy and Sibelius), the works of J.S. Bach and his contemporaries occupied an important place in the repertory, as did those of Liszt and Wagner. The concerts given by A.D. Sheremet'yev in the early years of the century were popular in St Petersburg and its environs.

(ii) Opera and ballet. Opera and ballet, which formed an important part of cultural life in the city, achieved new heights in the 19th century. The Imperial Theatres were reorganized under a crown monopoly in the early years of the century, and St Petersburg was provided with four theatres, each performing in a different language – French, Italian, German and Russian. The Italian company was quickly disbanded and the French company was a casualty of the war with Napoleon in 1812. From this year St Petersburg had only the German and Russian theatres, each performing opera and spoken drama in its respective language. Italian and French operas, however, continued to dominate their repertories. When the Little Wooden Theatre closed in 1804 its director, the Venetian composer Catterino Cavos, was transferred to the Russian troupe, housed at the Bol'shoy, and consolidated his position as the leading composer in the city. His most famous opera was Ivan Susanin (1815), whose subject inspired the first great Russian opera, Glinka's A Life for the Tsar, chosen to inaugurate the newly refurbished Bol'shoy in 1836. By this time the Russian troupe had improved dramatically, thanks largely to two outstanding singers, the bass Osip Petrov and the contralto Anna Vorob'yova. Despite the success of A Life for the Tsar and Glinka's next opera Ruslan and Lyudmila (1842), the Russian Opera pursued its Italian course with a will. In 1843 Tsar Nicholas I, determined to establish his capital as a world-class cultural centre, turned over the Bol'shoy to an Italian company, engaging such famous names as Rubini, Viardot, Grisi, Antonio Tamburini and Lablache. The German theatre closed in 1845, and from 1846 to 1851 the Russian troupe at the Bol'shoy was 'banished' to Moscow, and when it returned it was to the Teatr-Tsirk (Circus Theatre). This burnt down in 1859 and was replaced the following year by the sumptuous Mariinsky Theatre (fig.2). Here the Russian company made a gradual comeback as the Italian company declined. Russian premières at the Mariinsky included Serov's Judith (1863) and Rogneda (1865), Musorgsky's Boris Godunov (1874), Rubinstein's The Demon (1875), Rimsky-Korsakov's The Maid of Pskov (1873) and Snow Maiden (1882), Tchaikovsky's The Queen of Spades (1890) and Borodin's Prince Igor (1890). The repertory of the Mariinsky Theatre also included operas by Mozart, Weber, Cherubini and Verdi. Well-known singers regularly appeared there, among them Yelizaveta Lavrovskaya, Yuliya Platonova, Fyodor Komissarzhevsky, Fyodor Stravinsky (the father of the composer), Mariya Slavina, Nikolay Nikolayevich Figner and his Italian-born wife Medea Mei-Figner, Chaliapin, Sobinov, Ivan Vasil'yevich Yershov and Félia Litvinne. Conductors included Konstantin Lyadov (1860–69), Nápravník (1863–1914) and Albert Coates (1914–19). Because of the success of the Mariinsky Theatre, further fuelled by growing Russian nationalism, the Italian opera company was disbanded in 1885.

The Mariinsky's fame was enhanced by its excellent ballet company. For many years (1869–1903) this was directed by Marius Petipa, whose stagings of the world premières of Tchaikovsky's The Sleeping Beauty (1890) and Glazunov's Raymonda (1898) and a revival of Tchaikovsky's Swan Lake (1895) heralded a new era in the history of ballet. Many of the ballet company's choreographers and soloists (notably Nizhinsky) later took part in Diaghilev's Ballets Russes in Paris.

The Mariinsky Theatre became a centre of Russian Wagnerism: from 1900 to 1905 the whole of the Ring was performed in the theatre and by 1914 all Wagner's operas except Parsifal had been given there. The opera troupe of the Mariinsky Theatre also put on public performances in the hall of the Narodnïy Dom (People's House) from 1909 until 1923. The experimental Teatr Muzïkal'noy Dramï (Theatre of Musical Drama) existed from 1912 to 1923; its productions were mounted in the great hall of the conservatory and conducted by Mikhail Bikhter.

(iii) Music education. Until the mid-19th century opera singers studied with actors at a school run by the directorate of the imperial theatres. From 1840 singing classes were held at the court chapel. Private schools also existed, but their activity was irregular.

A turning point in music education came when, on the initiative of Anton Rubinstein, music classes were opened at the RMO in 1860. Teachers included Pyotr Lody (singing), Otto Deutsch (choral singing and theory), Wieniawski (violin), Leschetizky (piano), Schuberth (cello) and Lomakin (singing). These classes formed the basis of the first Russian conservatory, founded in 1862 with Rubinstein as its director. The conservatory moved several times before settling in the former Bol'shoy Kamennïy Teatr on Theatre Square, rebuilt in 1896 by the architect V. Nikolya. Renowned teachers at the conservatory included Rimsky-Korsakov (1871–1908), who brought particular prestige to the composition class, Lyadov (1878–1914) and Glazunov (1899–1928; from 1905 he was also director).

As a counterbalance to the official RMO, Balakirev, jointly with Lomakin, organized the Free School of Music in 1862. Balakirev was director from 1862 to 1874 and from 1881 to 1908, and from 1874 to 1881 it was headed by Rimsky-Korsakov. The principal aims of the school were to disseminate music education among the city's middle classes, and to popularize both Russian music (by Glinka, Dargomïzhsky and, especially, the composers of The Five), and works by non-Russian composers such as Beethoven, Schumann, Liszt and Berlioz.

The so-called St Petersburg violin school, with Auer as its leader, can be traced back to Joachim (Auer's teacher) and Wieniawski (his predecessor). It produced a whole succession of violinists who strongly influenced the development of violin playing in Russia and throughout the world; among them were Yefrem Tsimbalist, Misha Elman, Miron Polyakin and Heifetz.

M.P. Azanchevsky, director of the conservatory from 1871 to 1876, presented to the conservatory library his rich collection of books, including rare editions from the 16th to 19th centuries. Mateusz Wielhorski also bequeathed to the conservatory an extensive library and a valuable collection of musical instruments.

(iv) Criticism. In the first half of the 19th century Odeyevsky (from 1824) and Senkovsky (1833–44) were prominent music critics. Later in the century leading critics included the composer and journalist Serov, who laid the foundations of Russian musicology, Stasov, the impassioned ideologue of the New Russian School, and Laroche, whose works deal with questions of aesthetics and the art of composition. Specialist music journals included Nuvvelist (1820–1900), Muzïkal'nïy i teatral'nïy vestnik ('Music and theatre bulletin', 1856–60), Muzïkal'nïy sezon ('Musical seasons', 1869–71), Muzïkal'nïy listok ('Musical rag', 1887–97), edited by the inveterate opponent of The Five, Aleksandr Famintsïn, and the Russkiy muzïkal'nïy vestnik ('Russian musical bulletin', 1885–8). The influential newspapers had their regular musical contributors, notably Cui in the Sankt-Peterburgskiye vedomosti ('St Petersburg gazette') from 1864. Prominent among musical journals in the years immediately before the Revolution were Russkaya muzïkal'naya gazeta (1894–1918) and Muzïkal'niy sovremennik ('Musical contemporary', 1915–17).

(v) Publishing and instrument making. Music printing was flourishing in St Petersburg by the end of the 18th century. In the first half of the 19th century important music publishers included Matvey Bernard (who ran the city's best music shops) and Vasily Denotkin, who sold his business to Fyodor Stellovsky in the 1850s. Prominent music publishers in the later 19th century were the brothers Vasily and Ivan Bessel (from 1869) and Aleksandr Gutheil, who in 1886 took over the firm of Stellovsky. All these firms published the classical European repertory, teaching manuals and scholarly works; but it was their support of contemporary Russian composers that brought them international fame.

Workshops were opened manufacturing wind instruments during the 19th century, often employing craftsmen from Saxony. Russian instrument makers included Ivan Batov, who studied the art of building keyboard instruments in St Petersburg from 1803 to 1805 and later produced excellent violins, violas, cellos and guitars. Several factories manufactured keyboard instruments, notably those of Diderichs (1810–1918), Schröder (1818–1918) and Becker, opened in 1841 and bought up by Schröder in 1903.

3. From 1918.

(i) Amateur music-making. With the October Revolution of 1917, the era of socialism began. By a decree of 22 November 1918 the Mariinsky Theatre, the court chapel, the conservatory, the music schools, the property and archives of the RMO, publishing houses, music shops and instrument factories were all nationalized. In the years 1917–19 the city was in a state of siege, suffering from famine, cold and epidemics. However, the theatres and concert halls continued to function. Music education was greatly expanded, and the number of regional music schools for children and adults gradually increased. Popular concerts were frequently arranged (on 27 October 1918, for example, extracts from the operas of Wagner and Skryabin's Poème de l'extase were played under the direction of Coates), together with public lectures on music. In the 1920s elaborate productions were given in the open air with the participation of choral and orchestral collectives, such as the Gimn osvobozhdyonomu trudu ('Hymn to Liberated Labour') and Vzyatiye Zimnego dvortsa ('The Capture of the Winter Palace'). A variety of amateur artistic enterprises emerged, and Soviet musical culture developed under the slogan 'Muzïka – Massam' (Music for the Masses). Hence the huge range of cultural-educational work and the involvement of the masses in the activities of the theatres and concert halls. Choral Olympiads directed by the conductor Iosif Nemtsev became very important: in 1927 6000 people took part, in 1930 12,000; and at the Olympiad of 1932 Berlioz's Grande symphonie funèbre et triomphale was performed by combined wind bands. Workers and students, soldiers and collective farm workers were encouraged to take part in amateur music-making, and amateur performances flourished throughout the whole Soviet period. Opera and ballet studios, orchestras and choirs (for example, the student choir of Leningrad University, formed in 1949, or the amateur choral group formed under the directorship of Yelizaveta Kudryavtseva in 1960) all contributed to the musical life of the city. The Narodnïy Teatr Operï i Baleta (People's Theatre of Opera and Ballet) and the Narodnaya Konservatoriya (People's Conservatory) were founded in 1945 and 1961 respectively.

(ii) Concerts and music societies. Before 1917 St Petersburg had only one permanent concert orchestra, the court orchestra. The Philharmonic (formed officially in 1921) came into being on the basis of this orchestra after the Revolution. Its musical directors in the 1920s were Emil Cooper (1921–2) and Nikolay Mal'ko (1926–9). The latter performed many works by contemporary Western composers. He was succeeded by Aleksandr Gauk (1930–34), Fritz Stiedry (1934–7) and Yevgeny Mravinsky, who remained in the post from 1938 until his death in 1988. In 1940 the music critic I.I. Sollertinsky was appointed the orchestra's artistic director.

After the Revolution the court chapel's activities were revised and from 1918 to 1922 it was called Narodnaya Khorovaya Akademiya (People's Choral Academy). In 1954 it was named after Glinka. In the 1920s female voices were added to the choir. It was due to the efforts of its conductor M.G. Klimov (1919–35) that, alongside the traditional repertory of Baroque oratorios, it also gave the Russian premières of contemporary works, including Stravinsky's The Wedding and Oedipus rex and Honegger's Le roi David and Cris du monde. Klimov's successors were A.V. Sveshnikov (1937–41) and Grigory Dmitrevsky (1943–53).

During the 1920s many amateur and professional music societies were active in the city. The most important were the Kruzhok Druzey Kamernoy Muzïki (Club for Devotees of Chamber Music, 1922–33); the Leningrad branch of the Assotsiatsiya Sovremennoy Muzïki (Association for Contemporary Music, 1925–9), and the Kruzhok Novoy Muzïki (Club for Contemporary Music, 1926–7). The first concert jazz band in the USSR was founded in the city in 1929 under the direction of Leonid Utyosov, who later appeared as a soloist.

A number of Leningrad musicians suffered in Stalin's purges from the late 1930s onwards, including the musicologists Pavel Vul'fius and Berta Uritskaya, the organists Liss (who perished) and Vil'gel'm Deringer, the violinist Aleksandr Strashevsky (who also died), the singer Nikolay Pechkovsky and the composer Oleg Khromushin.

During World War II Leningrad's musical institutions were evacuated: the Kirov to Perm', the Malïy Opera Theatre to Orenburg, the former court chapel to Kirov, the conservatory to Tashkent and the Philharmonic to Novosibirsk. Before their evacuation artists gave concerts at the front, on ships and at call-up stations. For example, during the first two months of the war the members of the Philharmonic Orchestra gave 528 concerts, and the orchestra continued to give regular concerts in Novosibirsk. Even during the siege of Leningrad (1941–4) musical life did not stop. Concerts were provided by the 'Radiokomitet' Orchestra, under its conductors Karl Eliasberg and Nikolay Rabinovich: Beethoven's Ninth Symphony was performed in October 1941, Shostakovich's Seventh in August 1942, etc. In 1942 there were 50 concerts and in 1943 as many as 72. Concerts were also given by the Vasily Andreyev Orchestra of Folk Instruments (founded in 1886), and ensembles of troops. Various composers (including Boris Arapov, Orest Yevlakhov, Viktor Voloshinov, Yury Kochurov and Izrail' Finkel'shteyn) gave charitable concerts at factories and in military units.

After the siege of Leningrad musicians and musical organizations returned to the devastated city. Many had perished at the front (among them the composers Viktor Tomilin and Veniamin Fleyshman) or else died from hunger or disease (Nikolay Malkov, Julia Veisberg, Aleksey Finagin and Zinaida Eval′d), while others moved to Moscow (Shostakovich, Sofronitsky, Asaf′yev). Soon, however, concert activities had returned to their former level.

After the war the Leningrad PO enhanced its fame outside the Soviet Union with a series of international tours, and in 1972 it became the first orchestra in the country to receive the title 'academic honoured ensemble'. Many of the world's most famous conductors (including Walter, Klemperer, Erich Kleiber, Monteux, Karajan, Bernstein, Boulez, Solti and Abbado) and soloists have worked with the orchestra, whose resident conductors have included Kurt Sanderling (1941–60) and Arvīds Jansons (1952–84). The orchestra occupies the building of the former Assembly of the Nobility; this has a great hall (seating 1318) and (since 1949) a small hall, rebuilt from the former Engelhardt Hall (seating 480). The majority of Shostakovich's symphonies received their premières under Mravinsky's direction in the great hall. Regular organ recitals were also given here. In 1976 a Shostakovich festival was inaugurated, and in 1987 an international string quartet competition was instigated in the small hall of the former Engelhardt Hall. After Mravinsky's death, Yury Temirkanov was appointed the orchestra's music director.

In 1953 the former orchestra of the Leningrad Radio Committee was transferred to the aegis of the Philharmonic, and is now known as the Academic Orchestra. Its conductors have included Eliasberg (1931–49), Rabinovich (1950–60), Jansons (1961–8), Temirkanov (1968–77) and Aleksandr Dmitriyev (from 1977). Two chamber orchestras were formed during the 1960s from the orchestras of the Philharmonic. Other notable orchestras include the Orkestr Starinnoy i Sovremennoy Muzïki (Orchestra of Ancient and Modern Music), founded in 1967 under Rabinovich and subsequently expanded under the direction of Ravil′ Martïnov, and the St Petersburg Camerata, the chamber orchestra of the Hermitage Theatre, directed since 1989 by Saulyus Sondetskis. The small hall of the former Engelhardt Hall has become the city's main venue for chamber music.

Regular concerts (including educational concerts) are also given in the A.K. Glazunov small hall of the conservatory (seating 576), in the auditorium of the Dom Kompozitorov (House of Composers) on the Malaya Morskaya, in the Munizipaldom Zentrum (Municipal Centre, the former palace of the princes Belosel′sky-Belozersky) and elsewhere. Concerts of popular and light music are given in the Kontsertdom (Concert House) near the Finland Station (founded in 1960, with a seating capacity of 800) and in the 'Oktyabr′skiy' (October Hall), founded in 1967, seating 3734.

The choir of the Akademicheskaya Kapella (Academic Cappella), founded in 1974 and directed by Vladislav Chernushenko, has revived Russian liturgical works of the 18th and 19th centuries that were forbidden during the Soviet era, and has also performed ancient Russian canticles deciphered by St Petersburg palaeographers. The Academic Cappella also commissions works from contemporary composers in the city, including Valery Gavrilin, Yury Falik and Sergey Slonimsky. Other notable choirs include the St Petersburg Chamber Choir (founded in 1977 under Nikolay Kornev), the 'Lege Artis' chamber choir (founded in 1988 under Boris Abal′yan) and the Molodyozhnïy Kamernïy Khor (Youth Chamber Choir), founded in 1992 under Yuliya Khutoretskaya.

The St Petersburg branch of the Union of Composers was founded in 1932 and in 1999 numbered 205 members, among them the composers Galina Ustvovl′skaya, B.L. Klyuzner, V.E. Basner, B.I. Tishchenko and A.A. Knayfel′. The Muzïkal′naya Vesna v Peterburge (Musical Spring in St Petersburg) festival has been held annually since 1965, and presents works by local composers alongside classics of the 20th-century repertory. Two other festivals devoted mainly or entirely to contemporary music are Zvukovïye Puti (Sound Paths), founded in 1989, which also organizes seminars and masterclasses; and Ot Avantgarda do Nashikh Dney (From the Avant-Garde to the Present Day), founded in 1993, in which the conductor Valery Gergiyev is closely involved. In 1990 a children's festival, the Mezhdunarodnïy Detskiy Muzïkal′nïy Festival, was founded. One of the most important international events on the St Petersburg musical calendar is the June festival Zvyozdï Belïkh Nochey (Stars of the White Nights), founded in 1993 under the artistic direction of Gergiyev in succession to the Belïye Nochi festival.

(iii) Opera. The Mariinsky Theatre continued to function almost continuously throughout the revolutionary and post-revolutionary years. In the 1920s it was given the name Gosudarstvennïy Akademicheskiy Teatr Operï i Baleta (State Academic Theatre of Opera and Ballet), and in 1935 it was renamed again as Teatr imeni S.M. Kirova (Kirov Theatre). It was re-equipped between 1963 and 1970, and seats 1621. In 1991 it reverted to the name Mariinsky. For a while the repertory was adventurous, and included Stravinsky's Solovey (1918), Schreker's Der ferne Klang (1925), Prokofiev's The Love for Three Oranges (1926) and Berg's Wozzeck (1927).

In 1920 the Malïy Opernïy Teatr (Small Opera Theatre), formerly known as the Mikhaylovsky, was opened as the second most important theatre in the city, with a seating capacity of 1243. By the mid-1920s it had clearly defined its repertory policy: besides productions of established operas, the theatre, under the direction of Samuil Samosud (1918–36), vigorously promoted contemporary works such as Krenek's Der Sprung über den Schatten (1927) and Jonny spielt auf (1928). New operas by Soviet composers became a speciality, and the Malïy Theatre staged the premières of both of Shostakovich's operas: The Nose (1930) and The Lady Macbeth of the Mtsensk District (1934). The work of the theatres, and Shostakovich's operatic career, suffered a severe setback with the publication in 1936 of a denunciatory article in Pravda. The response to this ideological criticism was the production of such officially approved operas as Dzerzhinsky's Quiet Flows the Don (1935) and Virgin Soil Upturned (1937), Zhelobinsky's Mother (1939) and Pashchenko's Pompadurï (1939). In 1927 the Teatr Muzïkal′noy Komedii (Theatre of Musical Comedy) opened, with a seating capacity of 1580. Its repertory consisted mainly of classical operettas, Soviet operettas and musicals. During the siege of Leningrad, when the Kirov and the Malïy theatres were evacuated, the Theatre of Musical Comedy was the most frequented theatre in the city.

In the postwar years the Kirov updated its regular repertory and continued to stage new Soviet operas. Among its most important premières were A.P. Petrov's Peter I (1975) and Mayakovsky Begins (1985). Temirkanov was appointed music director of the Kirov in 1976, and was succeeded by Gergiyev in 1988. Under Gergiyev the Kirov/Mariinsky has given many concert performances of operas and held festivals devoted to Musorgsky (1989), Prokofiev (1991–2), and Rimsky-Korsakov (1994). In addition to the classical repertory, the Maliy Theatre has continued to focus on contemporary works. In 1946 it staged the première of the expanded version of Prokofiev's War and Peace, and subsequently mounted the first performances of Sergey Slonimsky's Virineya (1967) and Mariya Styuart (1981). It has also staged the premières of several important ballets.

The Theatre of Musical Comedy has likewise extended its classical repertory while continuing to stage new operettas. St Petersburg composers who have contributed to this genre include V.E. Basner, A.P. Petrov and G.A. Portnov. Chamber operas are mounted by the experimental theatre 'Sankt-Peterburg Opera', while the 'Zazerkal'ye' children's music theatre stages productions for both young and adult audiences.

(iv) Music education. The position of the conservatory was extremely difficult in the early years after the Revolution. It was headed by Glazunov until 1928, and its professors included Steinberg (composition), Cooper (conducting), Yershov (opera), Leonid Nikolayev (piano) and Ossovsky (musicology). The number of students dropped and classes were often cancelled. Under pressure from the younger generation of composers and musicologists, the conservatory was reorganized from the mid-1920s by Asaf'yev, V.V. Shcherbachyov and others. Among its graduates in the 1920s and 30s were the composers Shostakovich, Sviridov, Solov'yov-Sedoy and Dzerzhinsky, and the pianists Yudina, Sofronitsky, the musicologists Kushnaryov, Tyulin, Brazhnikov and Druskin, the conductors Dranishnikov and Mravinsky, the organist Braudo and the singer Preobrazhenskaya. Many of these later became professors at the conservatory. Notable musicians who have taught at the conservatory since the 1940s include the pianists Pavel Serebryakov (director from 1938 to 1951 and from 1961 to 1977), Nadezhda Golubovskaya, Vera Razumovskaya, Vladimir Nil'sen and Moisey Khal'fin, the violinist Yuly Eydlin, the musicologists Yelena Orlova, Yekaterina Ruch'yevskaya, Tat'yana Bershadskaya and Semyon Ginzburg (in addition to Druskin and Brazhnikov), and the composers Sergey Slonimsky, Boris Tishchenko, Vladislav Uspensky, Lyutsian Prigozhin and Gennady Banshchikov. A special music school for gifted children (founded in 1936) is attached to the conservatory, as is the Uchilishche imeni Rimskogo-Korsakova (Rimsky-Korsakov Music College). In addition to these, St Petersburg also has 25 music schools, the Uchilishche imeni Musorgskogo (Musorgsky College) and a music teachers' training college. Music is taught at the Akademiya Kul'turï (Academy of Culture), and a music faculty was opened in 1988 at the Rossiyskiy Gosudarstvennïy Pedagogicheskiy Universitet imeni A.E. Gerstena (Gersten Russian State Pedagogical University).

(v) Musicology and criticism. The Institut Istorii Iskusstva (Institute for the History of the Arts) was founded in 1921 on the basis of public courses in music history established in 1913 at the house of Count Valentin Zubov. Renamed the Instituta Teatra Muzïki i Kinematografii (Institute of Theatre, Music and Cinematography) in 1969 and from 1992 called the Rossiyskiy Institut Iskusstvoznaniya (Russian Institute for the History of the Arts), it remains one of the most important centres of scholarship in the country. It has departments for music, folklore, the study of instruments and the study of sources. Scholars who have worked there include Genrikh Orlov, Izaly Zemtsovsky, Abram Klimovitsky and Mark Aranovsky. The institute issued an annual collection of articles (1962–75, 1977) entitled Voprosï teorii i èstetiki muzïki ('Questions of music theory and aesthetics') and numerous thematic catalogues.

Prominent music critics in the years after the Revolution were Asaf'yev, Strel'nikov and especially Ivan Sollertinsky, who had important influence on the city's musical life in the 1920s and 30s. Since the fall of communism two new musical journals have been founded: Mariyinsky teatr (1992) and Pro musica (1995). Musical articles also appear in the Zhurnal lyubiteley iskusstva ('Journal for art lovers'), founded in 1996.

The Muzey Muzïkal'nogo i Teatralnogo Iskusstva (Museum of Musical and Theatrical Art) was opened in 1918, and the Muzey Muzïkal'nïkh Instrumentov (Museum of Musical Instruments) was founded in 1902 and reopened in 1951; it possesses some 2500 instruments. There are also museums at the houses of Rimsky-Korsakov (1971) and Chaliapin (1975), and in the Sheremet'yev palace (1994). Each has a small concert hall where recitals are arranged.

(vi) Publishing and instrument making. After the Revolution a branch of the Gosudarstvennoye Muzïkal'noye Izdatel'stvo (State Music Publishing House), later called Muzïka, was opened. New works were also published by the cooperative publisher Triton (1925–36). In 1957 a branch of the central publishing house Sovetskiy Kompozitor (Soviet Composer) was opened in Leningrad. In 1993 this became independent, changing its name to Kompozitor Sankt-Petersburg. In 1992 the private music publisher Severnïy Olen' was opened, directed by the composer Sergey Banevich.

The first electronic instrument in Russia, the theremin (or termenvoks), was produced in Petrograd in 1920. Invented by Lev Termen, it attracted the attention of physicists and musicians throughout the world. The emiriton, invented in 1935 by Aleksandr Ivanov and Andrey Rimsky-Korsakov, was also produced in the city. In 1924 the largest musical instruments factory in the country, Krasnïy Oktyabr' (Red October) was opened, manufacturing predominantly pianos. In addition, factories were built for wind and plucked string instruments (including balalaikas and harps).

(vii) Libraries. The Russian National Library (formerly the Gosudarstvennaya Publichnaya Biblioteka) is the largest repository of books and printed music in the country. After the 1917 Revolution and the nationalization of large private libraries (in particular those of the Yusupovs and the Stroganovs) the stock of printed books and manuscripts was increased significantly. The library contains many thousands of old Russian church manuscripts, 18th-century psalmï and kantï and tens of millions of books on music. Of great value, too, are the collections of books and printed music in the libraries of the conservatory, the Institute for the History of the Arts, and the Museum of Theatrical and Musical Art. Significant also are the collections of music manuscripts held by the Mariinsky Theatre, the Philharmonic and the former court chapel.

The archive for folklore is concentrated in the Institut Russkoy Literaturï: Pushkinskiy Dom (Institute for Russian Literature: Pushkin House), part of the Russian Academy of Sciences. It houses many thousands of cylinders, discs and tapes of folk music of the nationalities of the former Soviet Union and many foreign countries. The systematic recording of folksongs began in 1884, when, on the initiative of Balakirev, a folksong commission was set up under the aegis of the Imperatorskoye Russkoye Geograficheskoye Obshchestvo (Imperial Russian Geographic Society). Folklore expeditions have continued under the auspices of the Union of Composers (until the mid-1980s), the conservatory and the Rimsky-Korsakov Music College. Letters and diaries of Russian musicians and music manuscripts are held by the Tsentralnïy Gosudarstvennïy Arkhiv Literaturï i Iskusstva (Central State Archive of Literature and Art), at the Institute for the History of the Arts, the State Public Library and the conservatory.

LYUDMILA KOVNATSKAYA

Saint-Saëns, (Charles) Camille (b Paris, 9 Oct 1835; d Algiers, 16 Dec 1921). French composer, pianist, organist and writer. Like Mozart, to whom he was often compared, he was a brilliant craftsman, versatile and prolific, who contributed to every genre of French music. He was one of the leaders of the French musical renaissance of the 1870s.

1. LIFE. His father, Jacques-Joseph-Victor Saint-Saëns (1798–1835), descended from a Norman agricultural family, served as a clerk at the Ministry of the Interior and in 1834 married Clémence Collin (1809–88); the couple lived with Clémence's aunt and uncle, the Massons. Within a year of the wedding, however, both M. Masson and Jacques Saint-Saëns had died, the latter just three months after the birth of his son. After spending two years in a nursing home in Corbeil, the tubercular Camille was brought up by his mother and aunt. He was taught to play the piano from the age of three by Mme Masson and later Camille Stamaty, and at the age of ten made his formal début at the Salle Pleyel with a programme that included Beethoven's Piano Concerto in C minor and Mozart's Concerto in B♭ K450, for which he wrote his own cadenza. He performed everything from memory, which was considered an unusual feat at the time. Stamaty recommended that he should also study composition with Pierre Maleden, a former pupil of Fétis and Gottfried Weber, whom Saint-Saëns was to consider an incomparable teacher.

Saint-Saëns showed the same quickness in his general education, studying the French classics, religion, Latin and Greek and acquiring a taste for mathematics and the natural sciences, including astronomy, archaeology and philosophy, subjects on which he was later to write with enthusiasm. When he sold the publishing rights of his Six duos for harmonium and piano to Girod for 500 francs in 1858, he used the proceeds to buy a telescope.

Saint-Saëns entered the Paris Conservatoire in 1848 and studied the organ with Benoist, winning the premier prix in 1851. In the same year he began to study composition and orchestration with Halévy, and also took lessons in accompaniment and singing. A scherzo for small orchestra, a Symphony in A, the choral piece Les djinns, two romances and a number of incomplete works date from this period. Although he failed to win the Prix de Rome, his Ode à Sainte-Cécile won first prize in a competition organized by the Société Sainte-Cécile, Bordeaux, in 1852. He began two opéras comiques at about this time, but neither one was completed. In 1854 he wrote the overture (and began a duo) to a scenario suggested by Jules Barbier; this was performed and published only in 1913. Meanwhile, he completed a number of songs, the Piano Quintet op.14 and the Symphony 'Urbs Roma', which won another competition organized by the Société Sainte-Cécile in 1857. At this time he also contributed to the complete edition of the works of Gluck; he was subsequently to work on editions of works by Beethoven, Liszt, Mozart and the French clavecinists.

Saint-Saëns's gifts early won him the friendship and patronage of Pauline Viardot, Gounod, Rossini and Berlioz; Berlioz said of him: 'he knows everything but lacks inexperience'. Liszt also was much impressed by him as a pianist and a composer. In 1853 he was made organist of St Merry, where his Mass op.4, dedicated to the Abbé Gabriel, was performed in 1857. In gratitude the Abbé invited Saint-Saëns to accompany him on a visit to Italy which inaugurated a lifetime of travel for the young composer. Also in 1857, he was nominated to the Madeleine, where he remained until 1877; it was there that Liszt heard him improvising and hailed him as the greatest organist in the world. At this time Saint-Saëns composed the Symphony no.2 and several lyric scenes. He was also active in promoting the music of a number of other composers. He was one of the first to appreciate Wagner and defended both Tannhäuser and Lohengrin against the attacks of his elders. Schumann was another modern composer whom he persisted in playing despite the disapproval of conservative opinion. At his own expense he also organized and conducted concerts of music by Liszt – notably in March 1878 at the Salle du Théâtre Italien in gratitude for Liszt's encouragement of Samson et Dalila – and he was the first to play Liszt's symphonic poems in France. His own ventures in the form – Le rouet d'Omphale (1871), Phaéton (1873), Danse macabre (1874) and La jeunesse d'Hercule (1877) – popularized what was then a novelty and influenced subsequent developments in French music. Old music as well as new attracted his inquiring mind. He helped to revive interest in Bach (even converting his sceptical friend Berlioz to the cause) and did much to restore Mozart to his rightful place. Handel, little known then to French audiences, was the inspiration for Saint-Saëns's own oratorios, among them Le déluge (1875) and The Promised Land (1913).

The early 1860s were perhaps the most contented years of his life. His home environment was comfortable, and in public he enjoyed a formidable reputation as a composer and virtuoso pianist. His concert overture Spartacus won another competition organized by the Société Sainte-Cécile, and although his second attempt at the Prix de Rome in 1863 failed, in 1867 his cantata Les noces de Prométhée won a competition at the Grande Fête Internationale du Travail et de l'Industrie, whose jury included Rossini, Auber, Berlioz, Verdi and Gounod. He also performed his First Piano Concerto with some success in Paris and abroad during the 1860s, and his Sérénade op.15, dedicated to Princess Mathilde Bonaparte, was played at salons and in a prestigious concert at the Salle Pleyel attended by Berlioz, Gounod, Hiller, Liszt and others. Moreover, as a virtuoso pianist he was favourably placed to urge the claims of his own works, and although his material success and his sarcastic tongue made him many enemies, Gounod described him as 'the French Beethoven' (Bonnerot, 1914, p.126).

This period also included the only professional teaching appointment Saint-Saëns held. From 1861 to 1865 he taught at the Ecole Niedermeyer, an institution founded to improve musical standards in French churches. His students included Fauré, Messager and Gigout, who each became lifelong friends. Although strict about purely technical matters, Saint-Saëns was an inspiring teacher, and his students remembered the intellectual excitement he stimulated with his revelation of modern music and the arts in general. A more far-reaching result of his activities was the Société Nationale de Musique, which he founded with his colleague Romain Bussine in 1871. The motto 'Ars Gallica' underlined its purpose of encouraging and performing music by living French composers. The secretary was Alexis de Castillon, and other committee members included Fauré, Franck and Lalo. The Société was to give important premières of works by Saint-Saëns, Chabrier, Debussy, Dukas and Ravel.

During the early 1870s Saint-Saëns wrote some articles for the journal Renaissance littéraire et artistique (signing himself 'Phémius'). He also wrote for the Gazette musicale and the Revue bleue, displaying vigour and lucidity in his style and relishing lively arguments with his opponents, notably d'Indy. In 1876 he visited Bayreuth for the second series of performances of the Ring and wrote seven long articles for L'estafette and a series of pieces entitled 'Harmonie et mélodie' for Le Voltaire. In 1914 he wrote another series of articles, entitled 'Germanophilie' (Paris, 1916), in which he promoted a ban on German music during the war (particularly the works of Wagner); these prompted many articles and letters in response. Less controversial were his publications on the décor of ancient Roman theatres, on the instruments depicted in murals at Pompeii and Naples, and on philosophical problems.

In 1875 Saint-Saëns married the 19-year-old Marie-Laure Truffot. The marriage was not a success. Saint-Saëns's mother disapproved, and her son was difficult to please. Two sons were born who died within six weeks of each other in 1878, one (aged two and a half) by falling out of a fourth-floor window, the second (aged six months) of a childhood malady. Saint-Saëns blamed his wife and three years later, while on holiday with her, suddenly vanished. A legal separation followed, and she never saw him again. She died in 1950 at Cauderan, near Bordeaux, in her 95th year. To a certain extent Saint-Saëns found an outlet for his affection and frustrated paternal instincts in a close relationship with Fauré. Indeed, as the years went by he tended to regard the latter's growing family as his own, and while he did all he could to further his protégé's career he became, for Fauré's wife and children, a benevolent uncle.

In 1877 his opera Le timbre d'argent had its première at the Théâtre Lyrique. The dedicatee of the opera, Albert Libon, died that year and bequeathed Saint-Saëns 100,000 francs to devote himself to composition. He wrote a requiem in memory of his benefactor which was performed on 22 May 1878 at St Sulpice. Saint-Saëns continued to perform at the Société Nationale, the chamber music society La Trompette and at the Salle Pleyel, composing a septet for La Trompette in 1880. His opera Henry VIII, to a libretto based on Shakespeare and Calderón, received its première in March 1883 and enjoyed great success. Saint-Saëns was elected to the Académie des Beaux-Arts in 1881, and was made an officier of the Légion d'Honneur in 1884.

The death of his mother in 1888 (his great-aunt had died in 1872) left him devastated. To recover his health he went to Algeria, which since his first visit in 1873 had been a favourite destination. During this time he had his possessions moved to Dieppe, where the Musée Saint-Saëns was established in July 1890. He continued to write, notably a series of articles entitled 'Souvenir' for the Revue bleue, and composed a number of songs. Further travels over the following years, usually based around concert tours, were to take him to southern Europe, South America (including Uruguay, for which he wrote a hymn, Partido colorado, for the national holiday on 14 July), the Canary Islands, Scandinavia and East Asia. While on holiday in Austria he dashed off Le carnaval des animaux in a few days (he forbade performances of the extravaganza, apart from 'Le cygne', during his lifetime, with an eye to his reputation). In Russia he performed in a series of seven concerts at St Petersburg sponsored by the Red Cross, and also met Tchaikovsky, with whom on one memorable occasion he danced an impromptu ballet to the piano accompaniment of Nikolay Rubinstein.

After his popularity in France began to wane, Saint-Saëns was still regarded in America and England as the greatest living French composer. During his first visit to America in 1906 he gave concerts at Philadelphia, Chicago and Washington, and in 1915 he returned to give a successful series of lectures and performances in New York and San Francisco. As early as 1871 he had made the first of many trips to England. He played before Queen Victoria and spent much time studying Handel manuscripts in the library at Buckingham Palace. In 1886 he was commissioned by the Philharmonic Society to write his Third Symphony, whose first performance he conducted in London. And in 1893 he conducted at Covent Garden a performance of Samson et Dalila in oratorio form – the English censor vetoed biblical topics in operas at that time. He was awarded honorary doctorates by the universities of Cambridge (1893) and Oxford (1907), and was made a Commander of the Victorian Order, following his composition of a march for the coronation of Edward VII in 1902.

He broke with the Société Nationale in 1886 when the committee decided that the works of foreign as well as French contemporary composers should be performed. This gave Saint-Saëns more time to write and compose for the theatre and to supervise performances of his operas in France and abroad. Although he was the first established composer to write film music (L'assassinat du duc de Guise, 1908), he did not succeed as well in the theatre as he did in the concert hall. Of his 13 operas (beginning with La princesse jaune, 1872, and including two commissioned by Monte Carlo), only Samson et Dalila remains in the repertory. Even this had a struggle to be heard at first, as impresarios fought shy of its biblical subject. Liszt encouraged him to finish it when they met at the Beethoven centenary celebrations, and he sponsored the première at Weimar in 1877 after delays caused by the Franco-Prussian War. Saint-Saëns restored Lully's music to Le Sicilien, ou L'amour peintre, staged at the Comédie Française in 1892, and Charpentier's music to Le malade imaginaire, performed at the Grand-Théâtre, Paris, later that year. He also completed his late friend Ernest Guiraud's opera Brunhilda, performed at the Opéra as Frédégonde in 1895.

Saint-Saëns was asked to assume the editorship of the complete works of Rameau for Durand in 1894, and in 1896 was invited to help Castelbon de Beauxhostes in his restoration of the Arènes de Béziers and to organize theatrical performances there. He composed incidental music for Louis Gallet's tragedy Déjanire, staged in 1898 with an orchestra that included the Garde Municipale of Barcelona, the Lyre Biterroise and 110 strings, 18 harps, 25 trumpets and choruses of more than 200; the audience of 10,000 came from all over France. In 1900 his cantata Le feu céleste, a celebration of electricity, opened the Exposition Universelle. Saint-Saëns was made a Grand Officier of the Légion d'Honneur in the same year, and was awarded the Cross of Merit by Emperor Wilhelm II; the following year he was named president of the Académie des Beaux-Arts.

He composed further incidental music, notably for Jane Dieulafoy's Parysatis at the Arènes de Béziers, where 450 instrumentalists and a chorus of 250 helped to evoke the oriental grandeur of the play. Sarah Bernhardt commissioned him to write incidental music for Racine's Andromaque, and his comedies Le roi apépi and Botriocéphale were performed in Paris. He arranged a number of his works for different forces, and reworked his incidental music for Déjanire as an opera for Monte Carlo. Much of his time was spent in Egypt and Algeria, and during winter 1910–11 the Théâtre Municipal in Algiers staged five of his operas in succession. While he was in Cairo in 1913 he was awarded the Grande Croix of the Légion d'Honneur. He continued to travel, conducting, performing and supervising his own works, and spent four months visiting South America in 1916 despite fatigue and paralysis in his left hand.

He concluded his virtuoso career with a concert on 6 August 1921 at the Dieppe Casino, where he played seven pieces to mark the 75 years of his public performances as a pianist. At Béziers he closed his conducting career with rehearsals for Antigone on 21 August 1921. He returned to Algiers in December, and began some orchestration; he died later that month. His funeral took place at the cathedral, and his body was then taken to the Madeleine in Paris where he was given a state funeral. Although he seemed a reactionary to his younger colleagues, in his time Saint-Saëns served French music well. The perspective of history shows him as a neo-classicist and as the embodiment of certain traditional French qualities – moderation, logic, clarity, balance and precision – that were coming back into fashion at the turn of the 20th century.

2. Camille Saint-Saëns

2. Works. Saint-Saëns wrote in every 19th-century musical genre, but his most successful works are those based on traditional Viennese models, namely sonatas, chamber music, symphonies and concertos. Well schooled in the works of Bach and Beethoven, he was influenced at an early age by Mendelssohn and Schumann. His essentially Viennese upbringing was coloured by the French musical tradition of his day, and salon pieces, operas, and Spanish and exotic compositions survive in abundance. Moreover, his keen historical sense led him to revive many 17th-century French dance forms (bourrées, gavottes, menuets etc.), and his feelings of national loyalty are reflected in numerous marches and patriotic choruses. Towards the end of his life, he developed an austere style comparable to Fauré's. Throughout his career his art was one of amalgamation and adaptation rather than that of pursuing new and original paths; and this led Debussy to epitomize him as 'the musician of tradition'. Saint-Saëns himself suggested: 'I am an eclectic spirit. It may be a great defect, but I cannot change it: one cannot make over one's personality'.

Saint-Saëns's musical language is generally conservative. Although some of his melodies are supple and pliable, many are formal and rigid. They are usually built in well-defined phrases of three or four bars, and the phrase pattern AABB is characteristic. The most distinctive aspect of his music is his harmony, in which he was influenced by the theories of Gottfried Weber. Modulations by 3rds are typical, and while most chordal progressions are simple and direct, the many digressions and alterations lend nobility or charm to the music. He had a tendency to repeat rhythmic patterns, not only in his dance music, but as a general aspect of style or to create an exotic atmosphere. He preferred duple, triple or compound metres (3/4 is often designated as 3) and the use of unusual or free metres is rare (though a 5/4 passage occurs in the Piano Trio op.92 and one in 7/4 in the Polonaise for two pianos op.77). Cross-accents are frequent (the Second Symphony op.55 and the Second Violin Sonata op.102), as are changes of metre within a movement or phrase (First Violin Sonata op.75). Although he was a competent orchestrator, he achieved his sense of colour more by harmonic means than by purely orchestral effects. Throughout his career he was a master of counterpoint, which he learnt from Cherubini's manual in use at the Conservatoire. His mastery of this aspect of his art is evident in the fugues in his three sets of keyboard pieces (opp.99, 109, 161), but his contrapuntal craft is a general characteristic of his style and pervades most of his works. He adhered to traditional forms in his neo-classical and sonata-orientated compositions, but allowed himself more formal freedom in descriptive pieces.

Most of Saint-Saëns's juvenile works remain unpublished, as do a great number of unfinished cantatas, choruses, songs and symphonies written before 1850. The most ambitious work of these early years was the Symphony in A (*c*1850). With the appearance of the Symphony no.1 (1853) and the Piano Quintet op.14 (?1855), Saint-Saëns entered a new phase of composition. These are serious and ambitious works written on a large scale, showing the influence of Schumann. The quintet is one of his earliest cyclic compositions and the piano writing is thick and heavy, a texture that is also in evidence in the 'Urbs Roma' Symphony and in those pieces from the period which combine piano and harmonium (e.g. op.8).

Not all the works written in the 1850s and 60s are so ponderous, however: the First Piano Trio op.18 has moments of extreme delicacy (the ostinato in the second movement is characteristic) and the Symphony no.2 is a prime example of orchestral economy, fugal severity and cyclic unity. The first three piano concertos (also from the 1850s and 60s) are notable as early examples of the piano concerto in France. The second, still in the repertory, has a first movement that deviates from the typical sonata-form pattern; all three have frivolous finales which capture the prevailing mood of the Second Empire. The First Cello Concerto op.33 is a far more serious work. Its stormy opening movement has an allegro appassionato character, more so than the two later works which actually bear this title (opp.43, 70). Saint-Saëns's willingness to experiment with the traditional form of the concerto is evident here and elsewhere, and his first works of descriptive music also date from the 1860s. In the Introduction and Rondo Capriccioso op.28 for violin and orchestra he used idiomatic Spanish rhythms, and in later works of this type (the Havanaise and Caprice andalous) he alternated raised and lowered 7ths to create a wistful mood. La princesse jaune, his first opera to be performed (1872), employs pentatonic melodies, used earlier in the march Orient et occident, and initiated a spate of operas on Japanese themes by other composers. His other exotic works (the Nuit persane, Suite algérienne, Africa, the Fifth Piano Concerto and Souvenir d'Ismaïlia) are frequently in the minor mode with the sixth and seventh degrees raised, also showing a variety of other techniques. The Rapsodie d'Auvergne and the Caprice sur des airs danois et russes are based on European folksongs, as are portions of several other works. Furthermore, the virtuoso pedal technique of his early organ works, such as the Fantaisie (1857) and the Trois rhapsodies sur des cantiques bretons (1866), is thought to have influenced the symphonic style of late 19th-century French organ writing. In the 1870s Saint-Saëns composed four symphonic poems (Le rouet d'Omphale, Phaéton, Danse macabre and La jeunesse d'Hercule) in which he experimented with orchestration and thematic transformation. La jeunesse d'Hercule is modelled closely on Liszt, but the others concentrate on some physical movement – spinning, riding, dancing – which is described in musical terms. He had previously experimented with thematic transformation in his programmatic overture Spartacus and later used it in his Fourth Piano Concerto and the 'Organ' Symphony (no.3).

Some of Saint-Saëns's best and most characteristic compositions date from the 1870s and 80s. These include the Fourth Piano Concerto, Third Violin Concerto, 'Organ' Symphony, Samson et Dalila, Le déluge, the Piano Quartet op.41, the First Violin Sonata, First Cello Sonata, Variations on a Theme of Beethoven and Le carnaval des animaux. Characteristic of many works written at this time is the use of repeated rhythmic motifs or of chorale melodies, combined in the second movement of the op.41 quartet. Both the Fourth Piano Concerto and the 'Organ' Symphony which begin in C minor and end in C major employ thematic transformation and a chorale melody, and the four movements are arranged (as are those of the First Violin Sonata) in an interlocking pattern of two plus two. Saint-Saëns worked on Le carnaval des animaux concurrently with the 'Organ' Symphony and it remains his most brilliant comic work, parodying Offenbach, Berlioz, Mendelssohn, Rossini, his own Danse macabre and several popular tunes. The Third Violin Concerto (1880) is more rewarding musically and less demanding technically than the two earlier violin concertos; the chorale-like passage in B major near the end may have been influenced by his own Fourth Piano Concerto. A Morceau de concert for violin, written in the same year as the concerto, shares a number of affinities with it. Unlike his other Morceaux de concert (opp.94, 154), this piece is essentially a concerto first movement.

As an opera composer Saint-Saëns had an unerring sense for accurate declamation; in Samson et Dalila he also retained the identity of aria and ensemble, welding the whole work together with solid musical craftsmanship. Among his other operas, Etienne Marcel, Henry VIII (which has a principal theme based on a traditional English melody that Saint-Saëns found in the Buckingham Palace library) and Ascanio merit study and revival. The subjects he chose call for the flamboyant expertise of a Meyerbeer, and although the operas contain much agreeable and skilfully shaped music, they are deficient in theatrical effect. The success of Samson et Dalila can be attributed not least to its having originally been conceived as an oratorio, thereby enabling the composer to concentrate on purely musical aspects.

3. Samson (Jean-Alexandre Talazac) brings down the Temple of Dagon at the end of Act 3 of the first Paris production of Saint-Saëns's 'Samson et Dalila', Eden-Théâtre, 31 October 1890: engraving from 'L'illustration' (8 November 1890)

Saint-Saëns wrote songs throughout his career, setting the poetry of Lamartine, Hugo and Banville as well as his own verses. The style naturally varies with the subject, but many songs reveal his vivid pictorial sense and his gift for caricature.

Much of Saint-Saëns's piano music was written after 1870. Most of it is salon music (mazurkas, waltzes, albumleaves, souvenirs etc.); but the three sets of Etudes (opp.52, 111, 135) and the Variations on a Theme of Beethoven op.35 (piano duo) rank with the concertos. The Septet op.65 (1880) is, like the suites (opp.16, 49, 90), a neo-classical work that revives 17th-century French dance forms. Although these dances are rigid and less original than the pavanes and menuets antiques of Debussy and Ravel, they reflect Saint-Saëns's interest in the rediscovery and revival of the forgotten French musical tradition of the 17th century (his editions of Lully, Charpentier and Rameau date from the 1890s).

Beginning with the Second Violin Sonata (1896), a stylistic change is noticeable in much of Saint-Saëns's music. The piano writing is generally more linear and less heavy, and there is a growing preference for the thin sonorities of the harp (as in the Fantaisie op.95 for harp, the Fantaisie op.124 for violin and harp and the Morceau de concert op.154 for harp and orchestra) and woodwind (as in Odelette op.162 for flute and orchestra and the solo sonatas for oboe, clarinet and bassoon opp.166–8). The two string quartets (opp.112, 153) mark the first elimination of the piano in his chamber works. Remote chord progressions and modal cadences become increasingly apparent, and the subjects of his stage works are almost exclusively Greek. This austere tendency is, of course, typical of many composers after World War I, but it serves to emphasize the classical aspect of Saint-Saëns's nature which, latent earlier, had seldom been displayed in such rarefied form. Saint-Saëns's oeuvre has been criticized as uneven; this is in part the result of both an unusual facility and his friendship with the publisher Auguste Durand, who was perhaps insufficiently critical. However, it is also diverse and multi-faceted.

Saint-Saëns's writings attest his wide tolerance on many musical issues and his concern for order, clarity and precision. Like the Parnassian poets, he was a proponent of 'art for art's sake', and his views on expression and passion in art conflicted with the prevailing Romantic aesthetic. In his memoirs, Ecole buissonnière, he wrote:

> Music is something besides a source of sensuous pleasure and keen emotion, and this resource, precious as it is, is only a chance corner in the wide realm of musical art. He who does not get absolute pleasure from a simple series of well-constructed chords, beautiful only in their arrangement, is not really fond of music.

Although Saint-Saëns's writings are remarkably consistent, it cannot be said that he evolved a distinctive musical style. Rather, he defended the French tradition that threatened to be engulfed by Wagnerian influence and created the environment that nourished his successors.

SABINA TELLER RATNER (with JAMES HARDING) (1), DANIEL M. FALLON/SABINA TELLER RATNER (2), SABINA TELLER RATNER (work-list, bibliography)

Saint-Sévin. See L'ABBÉ family.

Saint-Simon, Comtesse de. See BAWR, SOPHIE DE.

Saint-Simonians. Followers of a French social and philosophical movement, among whom several were musicians. Saint-Simonism was founded by a handful of disciples of the social thinker Claude-Henri de Rouvroy, count of Saint-Simon, shortly after his death in 1825. The Saint-Simonians preached the elimination of all hereditary rights, international cooperation for the peaceful exploitation of the globe, and the reorientation of social institutions towards 'the moral, intellectual and physical improvement of the poorest and most numerous class'.

The Saint-Simonians believed in the apostolic role of the artist and attempted to enlist writers, artists and musicians to their cause. In about 1830 or 1831, Liszt, Ferdinand Hiller and the tenor Adolphe Nourrit were apparently frequent visitors at the Saint-Simonians' public lectures and soirées in Paris. Berlioz became passionately interested at about the same time; on 28 July 1831 he wrote to the Saint-Simonian leader Charles Duveyrier that, in spite of certain doubts, 'I am today convinced that Saint-Simon's plan is the only true and only complete one, as far as the political reorganization of Society is concerned'. In late 1831 the movement suffered a schism and soon took on a more mystical character, thus alienating many of its former sympathizers (including Berlioz and Liszt).

This new, almost religious emphasis on the nobility of physical labour and on fraternal cooperation attracted several young musicians to Saint-Simonism. Félicien David became a member of the communal 'Famille saint-simonienne' at Ménilmontant, where he improvised at the piano during ceremonies and wrote choruses for the daily ritual. The amateur singers of the 'Family' were trained by Dominique Tajan-Rogé, a former cellist at the Opéra-Comique and a friend of Berlioz. In addition, a number of Saint-Simonian chansonniers wrote propagandistic poems to familiar tunes, and the best known, Vinçard aîné, wrote his own melodies.

In 1833, as the result of governmental persecution, many Saint-Simonians left France for Egypt. (The departures were celebrated by a new adherent, Reber, in his 'A l'Orient!'.) The Egyptian mission failed, thus marking the end of large-scale Saint-Simonian activity, but David gathered themes there which he later used in Le désert (1844) and other works. Apart from David, only Tajan-Rogé and Vinçard retained close ties with the movement's leaders later in life. But the movement left its mark on those who had attended the soirées of 1830–31 (not least on Liszt and Berlioz in their popular choral works) and it retains interest as one of the earliest social movements to make extensive use of music to propagate its ideas.

Sainz de la Maza (y Ruiz), Regino (b Burgos, 7 Sept 1896; d Madrid, 26 Nov 1981). Spanish guitarist, teacher and composer. He studied with Daniel Fortea, a student of Tárrega, and was strongly influenced by Llobet Soles. During the 1930s, 40s and 50s he toured extensively in Europe, North and South America, and in some African countries. He also toured Japan in the 1950s. In 1940 Sainz de la Maza gave the première in Barcelona of Rodrigo's Concierto de Aranjuez, dedicated to him and written at his instigation. He made the first recording of the work in the 1940s, with the Spanish National Orchestra under Ataulfo Argenta, and gave numerous performances of it in Europe and the Americas. Many other works were dedicated to him by other Spanish composers of the 'Generación del 27', among them Antonio José's 1933 Sonata. Sainz de la Maza's interpretations were admired for their rigour and elegance and a style that was according to Rodrigo, 'as he was: lean, precise [and] to the point'.

Sainz de la Maza was professor of guitar at the Madrid Conservatory from 1935 until his retirement in 1969 and wrote music criticism for the Spanish daily ABC from 1939 to 1952. He was elected to the Real Academia de Bellas Artes in 1956. As a composer, he wrote exclusively for the guitar in a stylized idiom that drew heavily on Castilian and Andalusian folksong; some of his works have become popular standards in the guitar repertory.

Saito, Hideo (b Tokyo, 23 May 1902; d Tokyo, 18 Sept 1974). Japanese cellist. He first studied the piano and at 14 conducted a Mandarin orchestra. In 1920 he attended Jochi University where he met Prince Hidemaro Konoe, a professor and conductor who took him to Germany. He studied with Klengel at the Leipzig Conservatory (1923–7). On his return to Japan he joined the New SO (now the NHK SO), began to teach and became the first Japanese professional cellist to play chamber music. He went back to Germany in 1930 and studied with Feuermann at the Berlin Hochschule für Musik until 1932, after which he returned to Japan to become principal cellist of the New SO; he also took up conducting at this time. In 1948 he founded the Tōhō School of Music, which he subsequently turned into a music university. Many celebrated musicians were his pupils: Seiji Ozawa, Nobuko Imai and Tsuyoshi Tsutsumi all owed their musical education to Saito and played in the Tōhō Chamber Orchestra, which Saito took on tours of the USSR and the USA. He was a member of the jury at the Marguerite Long-Jacques Thibaud Competition in 1973, and the same year was awarded the San Ford Prize from Yale University. (CampbellGC)

Sakač, Branimir (b Zagreb, 5 June 1918; d Zagreb, 29 Dec 1979). Croatian composer. He graduated in music at the Zagreb Academy in 1941, having studied composition with Franjo Dugan, and remained on the staff there (1941–6). Following this, he was conductor of the Radio Zagreb Orchestra (1946–8), chief of the music division of Radio Rijeka (1949–50) and professor at the state music school in Zagreb (1951–61). He founded and directed the Zagreb Fonoplastički Atelje-Theater, which worked in sound, light, movement and space, and which first performed at the Zagreb Biennale in 1967. From 1971 he was artistic director of the Annual Review of Yugoslav Music in Opatija (now the International Music Festival Opatija), and director of the Zagreb Biennale.

Breaking away from a conventional romantic style, Sakač first attracted attention with his Expressionist and sometimes violent Simfonija o mrtvom vojniku ('Symphony on a Dead Soldier', 1951), created from incidental music to the radio play Without a Title by Norman Corwin; the work's dramatic content was later realized in a powerful ballet. His Tri sintetske poeme ('Three Synthetic Poems', 1959) for tape marked a new departure in using musique concrète for programmatic purposes, an approach repeated in the vivid Jahači apokalipse ('Horsemen of the Apocalypse'). However, a later work, Prostori ('Spaces', 1965) dispenses with a programme and successfully combines sound transformations on tape with live orchestra. Fundamental to Sakač's development and his conversion to the avant garde was the outstanding large-scale orchestral work, Episodes, which demonstrated the composer's complete command of contemporary instrumental and compositional techniques, including the dramatic use of spatial notation. Another aspect of his later style is the use of novel vocal techniques, notably in Omaggio (1969) and in Umbrana (1971), in which 12 solo singers use the clusters, unusual vocal techniques and textures familiar in works of the Polish school.

Sakellarides, Joannes Theophrastos (b Litochoros, Olympus, ?1853; d Athens, 15 Dec 1938). Greek cantor, teacher and composer. He received his first musical training from his father, a priest, who sent him to secondary school in Thessaloniki, where he also took private tuition in chant and Arabo-Persian music. After enrolling at the University of Athens, he secured his first cantorial position and embarked on the study of Western music theory at the recently founded Athens conservatory. He was soon to regard the received tradition of Byzantine chanting as rife with Turkish influence, judging its melismatic repertories to be formless and disdaining its performing practice, which he described as rhinophōnia ('nasal singing'). Following this aesthetic reorientation, he was to devote his life primarily to the reformation of Byzantine chant along Western lines, advocating Westernized vocal technique, equal-tempered tuning, congregational singing and the introduction of simple harmonies, justifying the latter by dubious references to ancient texts. Bitterly opposed by traditionalists, he promoted his reforms while occupying a series of influential teaching and cantorial posts in Athens. In 1903 he visited Munich with his family to perform and lecture on Greek music. His teaching of the received chant tradition to H.J.W. Tillyard in 1904 decisively influenced Western study of Byzantine music.

As part of his reforming activities Sakellarides proffered a 'purified' post-Byzantine repertory in which most melismatic chants were radically simplified or eliminated, and less florid melodies were recast according to his classicizing rhythmic and metrical theories. His first collection of reformed chants, Chrēstomatheia ekklēsiastikēs mousikēs, was published in Byzantine neumes in Athens in 1880. Further publications in both neumatic and staff notation followed over the next 50 years, including Oktōēchos (1883), Asmata ekklēsiastika (1884–7), Hagiopolitēs (1905), Hiera hymnōdia (1902, 2/1914, 3/1923) and Hymnoi kai ōdai en harmonikē triphōnoi symphōnia (1930). He also composed patriotic songs, wrote music for three ancient dramas (including the Antigone of Sophocles, 1896) and made a controversial transcription of a medieval Byzantine acclamation. Although his reformed chant fell out of favour in late 20th-century Greece, it remains popular in the Greek diaspora and forms the basis for most Greek-American polyphony.

ALEXANDER LINGAS

Sakellaridis, Theofrastos (b Athens, 7 Sept ?1883; d Athens, 2 Jan 1950). Greek composer and conductor. He probably began his studies with his father Ioannis Sakellaridis, a scholar and composer of church music in the Byzantine style, and is reported to have studied in Germany and Italy. In Athens he built his reputation on the composition of incidental music, operas and revues, but mainly operettas; sometimes he produced original ideas from his research of cabaret tunes (in his revues) and from songs he heard in Gypsy encampments (in the opera Perouzé). For seven years, 1907–13, he adapted, composed and conducted the music of the popular yearly Panathenaea revues, which pungently satirized Greek society. From about 1910 he was, along with Hadjiapostolou, the most prominent operetta composer in Greece, exerting particular influence as conductor (1908–21) of the Elliniki (Hellenic) Operetta company, which staged many of his operettas. The decline in the popularity of operetta in Athens by the late 1930s prompted him to return to writing revues. He died in poverty. Although he emerged as a leading Greek operetta composer (airs from O vaftistikos, 1918, are still beloved in Greece today), Sakellaridis, who had a natural gift for stage melody, may come to be regarded as the foremost composer of serious opera between Samaras and Kalomiris.

Sakva, Konstantin Konstantinovich (b Usman', Voronezh Province [now Lipetsk Region], 22 Aug/4 Sept 1912; d Moscow, 1 Jan 1996). Russian musicologist and critic. In 1937 he completed his studies in the piano class of the Moscow Central School of Music, and later studied music history, graduating from the Conservatory in 1947. From 1946 he was involved in administrative work and held a series of managerial posts in the state and party machinery for directing cultural affairs. He was awarded the title Honoured Representative of the Arts of the RSFSR in 1973. He wrote numerous reviews concerning contemporary musical life and new works by Soviet composers. He wrote the scenario for the ballet Pervaya lyubov' ('First Love') to music by Mikhail Ziv. His main musical interest was the work of Mozart. His translation into Russian of Hermann Abert's W.A. Mozart (1978–85) contains expansive commentaries and was an important event in Russian Mozart studies.

ABRAHAM I. KLIMOVITSKY

Sala, Giuseppe (b *c*1643; d 1 Feb 1727). Italian publisher, printer and bookseller. From 1676 he was a member of the Venetian Printers' Guild, and in the same year he began printing thanks to the financial support of the composer Natale Monferrato, maestro di cappella of S Marco, publishing his Salmi concertati a 2 voci con violini e senza (op.11). He conducted his business, under the sign of King David playing the harp, at S Giovanni Grisostomo in the house of Monferrato. On the composer's death in 1685, Sala became the sole proprietor of the firm. In 1682 he published, anonymously, L'armonia sonora delle sonate, an anthology, edited by himself, of 12 sonatas for two violins and basso continuo by various composers.

An Indice dell'opere di musica sin hora stampate da Giuseppe Sala in Venezia (?1714) enumerates his output of psalms, motets, cantatas and sonatas, in particular those of Bassani, Monferrato, Giulio Taglietti and Corelli; he published at least 14 editions of Corelli's first five opus numbers. The index also shows that he published psalms by Sartorio, D.F. Rossi, Cazzati and F.M. Benedetti, motets by Legrenzi, G.B. Allegri, Bonporti, G.M. Bononcini and Gasparini, cantatas by Caldara, G.L. Gregori and Albinoni and sonatas by G.B. Vitali, Legrenzi, de Castro, Corelli, Torelli, Ercole Bernabei and Benedetto Marcello. Altogether Sala printed 151 publications between 1676 and 1716.

STEFANO AJANI/BIANCA MARIA ANTOLINI

Sala, Josquino della (fl ?1575, 1585–8). Italian composer. He worked at some time in Rome: an eight-part Missa 'Ave regina' in manuscript ascribed to 'Jusquinus de Sala' survives there (in I-Rvat C.S.). His reputation evidently extended to Venice, where three publications of 1585 each included a work by him: the four-part madrigal Le belle arcate ciglia (RISM 1585[29]), the madrigal Ne si dolce com'hor (1585[26]) and the five-part motet Benedicite Dominum (1585[4]). He later contributed this motet to Gerlach's Continuatio cantionum sacrarum (1588[2]). It is an effective, lively work in which he handled the polyphonic texture confidently, fashioned strong, rhythmic points of imitation, and introduced a buoyant, contrasting middle section in triple metre. One further surviving composition may be by Sala: a five-part madrigal Fuggimi pur crudel, attributed to 'Josquino Salem', appears in a collection compiled by Bavarian composers and published at Venice (1575[11]). The records of the Bavarian court chapel include no reference to any musician named Sala, but only to a lutenist called 'Josquino' who flourished there about 1575.

RICHARD MARLOW

Sala, Nicola (b Tocco-Caudio, nr Benevento, 7 April 1713; d Naples, 31 Aug 1801). Italian teacher and composer. From 1732 to 1740 he studied at the Conservatorio di S Maria della Pietà dei Turchini, Naples, with Nicola Fago and Leo. While still a maestrino there, he seems to have composed the opera Vologeso (Fétis claimed to have seen a score of it with an indication, otherwise unconfirmed, that it was performed in Rome in 1737). After the death of Leo in 1744 Sala applied unsuccessfully to succeed him as primo maestro of the royal chapel (his test piece, the five-part fugue Protexisti me dated 21 April 1745, is printed in his Regole). In the 1760s he had three operas as well as several prologues and other occasional works performed at the Teatro S Carlo. In 1783 the senate of Messina petitioned the king to allow them to appoint Sala maestro di cappella at the cathedral there without the usual competition, but the king refused.

Sala was most important as a teacher, providing a formative influence on many Neapolitan composers. Early dates are lacking, but he seems to have taught for most of his life at the Pietà dei Turchini conservatory, becoming secondo maestro in 1787 and primo maestro from 1793 until his retirement on 11 October 1799. His monumental Regole del contrappunto pratico (Naples, 1794) presents a complete course of theoretical and practical counterpoint from basic principles to complex manifestations. It seems to have been characteristic of Neapolitan teaching to emphasize practical demonstration rather than theoretical explanation, and the Regole follows this method by offering almost no written text to accompany its series of musical models. According to Villarosa, the work was published at government expense through Paisiello's influence. During the Revolution of 1799 the plates disappeared (about half of them were rediscovered in 1860 and are now in the Naples Conservatory), and copies of the work became rare and expensive. Perhaps partly because of that, Sala soon acquired an almost legendary reputation for profound contrapuntal knowledge (previously his name had been little known outside Italy). Choron described Sala's work as 'the most considerable and esteemed of all', and reprinted the second and third volumes of it in his Principes de composition (Paris, 1808), adding a large number of Sala's partimenti, not included in the Regole. Later, Fétis harshly attacked Sala's competence, describing his counterpoint as poorly written and in a bad style, and his fugues as lacking in interest, frequently monotonous, sometimes tonally uncertain and confused as to the difference between real and tonal answers.

Sala's compositions, although inconsequential and mostly pedestrian, have been unjustly treated by some modern writers. In particular, Mondolfi's harsh judgment on his operas is almost entirely directed at characteristics of the contemporary opera seria as a genre, not of Sala's operas exclusively. His greatest weakness was in lyrical melody; some of his arias in an agitato or declamatory style are not ineffective. He was better in his church music in a free style, where he could set off operatic solo writing against textures more highly worked and contrapuntal than in the opera. His Stabat mater is a worthy upholder of the Pergolesi tradition.

Salabert. French firm of music publishers. It was founded in Paris in 1894 by Edouard Salabert (b London, 1 Dec 1838; d Paris, 8 Sept 1903); he was paralysed in 1901, and the company was taken over by his son Francis Salabert (b Paris, 27 July 1884; d nr Shannon, Ireland, 28 Dec 1946). Salabert was among the first to internationalize popular music; his enterprises were diversified and mostly successful, including music from and for films, recordings, music-hall and concert productions, artist management, and publication of arrangements and original versions of all varieties of light music – European, Latin American and American. Salabert himself was responsible for countless arrangements. By 1945 his catalogue comprised some 800 symphonic works, 350 operettas, and 80,000 songs (including such names as Bruant, Henri Christiné, Reynaldo Hahn, Moretti, Vincent Scotto and Yvain). In his heyday, Salabert had four shops in Paris as well as branches in Berlin, New York, Milan, Brussels and Geneva. The Société Phonographique Francis Salabert produced hundreds of 78 r.p.m. records from 1927 to 1935, and under the label Solafilm he produced a collection of recorded mood music. He also established the Studios Salabert in Montrouge, near Paris, for film dubbing.

Salabert's association with serious music began in 1930 when he purchased the catalogue of Mathot, which included works by Alfredo Casella, Milhaud, Ravel and Florent Schmitt. By 1945 he had acquired the catalogues of 50 other publishers, among them Dufresne (1923), Gaudet (1927), Christiné (1937), Rouart-Lerolle (1941), Senart (1941) and Deiss (1946), becoming the publisher of compositions by Chausson, Henri Duparc, Honegger, Koechlin, Magnard, Mompou, Poulenc, Rivier, Satie and Sauguet, as well as of Alfred Cortot's editions of classical piano works.

In 1968 a catalogue of the Jeune école contemporaine was initiated; it contains hundreds of compositions by young composers, many of them avant-garde.

Under Mica Salabert, Francis's widow, Salabert continued as a leading publisher of contemporary music in particular of Xenakis and Takemitsu as well as Boucourechliev, Marius Constant, N.T. Dao, De Pablo, Guézec, Landowski, Malec, Méfano, Niculescu and very many younger composers including Aperghis, Dusapin, Lévinas and Murail. In 1981 Madame Salabert retired (d 1991) and was succeeded by Nelly Boufathal who continued a highly active policy of publication, notably taking on the bulk of Giacinto Scelsi's production. A record collection featuring mainly contemporary works from the Salabert catalogue was started in 1988. In 1991 the composer Marcel Landowski took over as managing director. In recent years particular efforts have been made to develop the light music catalogue.

Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn, Muḥammad (b Cairo, 7 Jan 1917; d Cairo, 8 July 1965). Egyptian music theorist and composer. He began his career as an inspector of music and later taught in Cairo. He was deeply impressed by the Western theory of musical temperaments, and tried to find a similar application within the Arab theory of music. He was a supporter of equal temperament and the division of the octave into 24 quarter equal tones. At first in his writings, he emphasized the problems raised by taṣwīr (transposition), and in 1947 he invented the al-būṣulah al-mūsīqiyyah (musical compass), which demonstrated that the transposition of any Arabic maqām was possible according to the circle of 5ths. As a composer he devoted himself to the composition of anāshīd (anthems), and pieces for children, chiefly printed in the Cairo journal al-Mūsīqá wa-al-Masraḥ.

CHRISTIAN POCHÉ

Salama, Gamal (b Alexandria, 5 Oct 1945). Egyptian composer. He took his first music lessons at the experimental music school in Helwan. At the age of 16 he continued his piano studies at the Cairo Conservatory, where he also studied composition with Gamal Abdel-Rahim and the Russian composer Guovany Michaelov. At that time he was already writing music for films and playing Egyptian light music in ensembles. After graduating in 1972 he pursued his musical studies at the Moscow Conservatory with Khachaturian (diploma, 1976). He then joined the Department of Composition and Conducting at the Cairo Conservatory, becoming an assistant professor there in 1997 teaching composition.

Salama's output consists largely of popular music, especially orchestrated popular solo songs. His work in this field enjoys a wide popularity in Egypt and in Arab countries. He also composes for film, stage and television. Among his more serious art works is the opera-ballet Eyoon Bahia (1976), which includes harmonizations of melodies using three-quarter tones. For this work he received a prize from the Academy of Arts (1977). Among his concert works are the Fugue for orchestra, some choral music, two suites for piano, two for cello and piano, and some pieces for flute and orchestra. He obtained the state prize in composition for his Memoires for orchestra. His style is distinguished by clear Egyptian melodic lines, Arab modality with or without three-quarter tones, and harmonies using parallel 4ths or 5ths or consisting of simple two-voiced polyphony.

AWATEF ABDEL KERIM

Salaman, Charles (Kensington) (b London, 3 March 1814; d London, 23 June 1901). English pianist, composer and scholar. His ancestors were of German-Dutch origin. After piano lessons from his mother and S.F. Rimbault, he studied at the RAM, 1824–6, and subsequently with Charles Neate, who became a lifelong friend. In 1828–9 he received lessons from Henri Herz in Paris. He gave annual concerts in London, 1833–7, performed in the Concerti da Camera (the first West End chamber music concerts) in 1835 and held Classical Chamber Concerts at his own home in 1844. He was also active as a composer: in 1830 he was commissioned to write an ode for the Shakespeare commemoration in Stratford-upon-Avon (the work was also performed in London), and in the late 1830s his first sets of songs were published. In 1838 and 1840 Salaman performed in Salzburg, Vienna, Munich and other European cities, and from 1846 to 1848 he lived and worked in Rome, where he was made an honorary member of the Accademia di S Cecilia (1846) and conducted the first Rome performance of Beethoven's Symphony no.2 (1848). His European travels brought him into contact with several famous musicians, among them Robert Schumann, Czerny and Thalberg.

From the 1850s Salaman pursued his scholarly interests in the history of music. He was a fellow of the short-lived Musical Institute of London (1851–3), which promoted academic discourse on music, and in 1855 he began to give 'illustrated' lectures in London and the provinces on the history of the piano and on other musical topics. He was a principal figure behind the establishment in 1858 of the Musical Society of London, serving as its secretary, 1858–65; in 1874 he helped found the Musical Association (secretary until 1877; vice-president, 1877–87) and gave papers at meetings during the organization's early years.

Salaman wrote several single-movement piano pieces and edited piano music by Beethoven, Mozart, Mendelssohn and others, but was best known in his lifetime as a song composer (he produced more than 200 songs, to texts by Horace, Catullus, Metastasio, Byron and others). His popular setting of Shelley's I arise from dreams of thee (written in 1836 and published two years later), though flawed by an unconvincing modulation and change of metre before its final sections, demonstrates his skill in writing lyrical vocal melodies and idiomatic piano accompaniments. He also set psalms and composed anthems, many of them for Jewish liturgical use. His book Jews as they are (1882, dedicated to Moses Mendelssohn), which sought to remove anti-Semitic prejudice in England, includes a defence of the Mendelssohn family's renouncement of Judaism.

GERARD BÉHAGUE

Salas y Castro, Esteban (b Havana, 25 Dec 1725; d Santiago de Cuba, 14 July 1803). Cuban composer. The son of natives of the Canary Islands, he received his earliest music instruction while a boy chorister, from 1734, in the leading Havana parish church of S Cristóbal (now the cathedral). At the age of 15 he enrolled at the local seminary, S Carlos, to study for the priesthood, but was forced to withdraw after his father's premature death. He supported his mother and siblings from his earnings as organist and choir director at S Cristóbal, where he attracted the attention of the bishop, Pablo Agustín Morell de S Cruz, who appointed him music director of Santiago de Cuba Cathedral. Arriving at his new post on 8 February 1764 he took over paid musical forces that included 14 musicians, among whom were the mulatto organist José Nicolás de Villavicendo, two tenors, two male altos, three tiples (trebles), two violinists and a harpist. As early as 2 November 1764 Salas petitioned the cathedral chapter for a bigger budget to allow salary increases for the musicians. On 15 March 1769 he completed an inventory of the cathedral music archive and instruments. After the disastrous earthquake of 1766, manuscripts were stored in the S Basilio el Magno diocesan seminary, where Salas resided. These included ten masses, eight Salve regina settings (six for double-choir) and other Latin church works. Salas also introduced works by Melchor de Montemayor, Sebastián Durón and Francisco Courcelle. His own earliest extant Latin work is a four-voice Ave maris stella with bajo (1764), after which he composed over 90 liturgical pieces, more than half of which survive in the archive, though most with incomplete parts. From 1783 he composed a large number of villancicos, cantatas and pastorelas, which were used during the Christmas season; for most of these he wrote his own texts. Although not ordained priest until 20 March 1790, Salas taught philosophy and theology at S Bâsilio seminary from 1784 until his retirement in 1798. In 1796 he was asked by the chapter to repay the costs of the musicians' salary increases granted in 1785. He only escaped ruin when a royal cedula (dated 27 November 1801) arrived cancelling the unpaid debt and granting him a prebend, requested by the chapter, to alleviate his penury in old age.

ROBERT STEVENSON

Salaverde, Bartolomé de Selma y. See SELMA Y SALAVERDE, BARTOLOMÉ DE.

Salazar, Adolfo (b Madrid, 6 March 1890; d Mexico City, 27 Sept 1958). Spanish writer on music and composer. He studied history at Madrid University but abandoned the course to concentrate on music; he was later a pupil of Pérez Casas and Falla in Madrid and Ravel in Paris. He co-edited (with Villar, 1916–17) the Revista musical hispano-americana from 1914 to 1918 and was music critic of the Madrid daily El sol, 1918–36. With Falla and M. Salvador y Carreras, he founded the Sociedad Nacional de Música (created to encourage the performance of contemporary Spanish chamber music) and served as secretary, 1915–22. In 1918 he was made vice-president of the music section of the Ateneo in Madrid, and in 1922 he replaced Pedrell as a member of the executive committee of the IMS at The Hague; he was also secretary of the Spanish section of the ISCM (1923) and a founder-member of the Société Française de Musicologie (1925). At the Residencia de Estudiantes in Madrid during the 1920s he was one of the influential group that included Falla, Turina, Sainz de la Maza, García Lorca, Buñuel and Dalí. He was also Spain's delegate to the annual festivals of the ISCM and to the Congress of Arabic Music in Cairo (1932). After winning a three-month fellowship in 1933 from the Junta de Ampliación de Estudios to pursue research he abandoned composition and devoted himself to writing.

Soon after the Civil War began Salazar sought exile and was appointed cultural attaché to the Spanish Republican Embassy in Washington. He then moved to Mexico City and taught at the Colegio de México (from 1939) and the Mexico National Conservatory (from 1946); he also gave a lecture series ('Music in Cervantes') at Harvard University (1947). In 1949 he was made a corresponding member of the Hispanic Society of America and of the Instituto Español de Musicología in Spain and was awarded a Guggenheim fellowship.

For the best and most informative reports concerning Spain's musical life from the end of World War I to the beginning of the Spanish Civil War, one must turn to Salazar's essay-like columns in El sol (many of which were incorporated in his early books). Using his knowledge of musical currents throughout Western Europe together with his staunch support for contemporary music, he prepared a new generation, nurtured on Romantic-nationalistic music, to accept modern trends. The embodiment of his aesthetic metamorphosis can be seen in his earlier support of Pedrell, F.A. Barbieri and Falla; by 1950, however, Salazar had come to re-evaluate Pedrell's nationalism as 'theoretical' and misleading, and to reappraise Falla as a 'petit maître' who stood at the end of a blind alley. In addition to being a prolific writer, Salazar was a brilliant polemicist, whose published arguments were highly regarded in intellectual and political circles. His essential premise was his view of music as part of an evolving society: he saw the need to search for 'the internal motives (acoustic and aesthetic)' rather than a description of musical works (the 'results') in themselves. Among his later published works, La música en la sociedad europea (1942–6), La música de España (1953) and La música en Cervantes y otros ensayos (1961) are his most important, of which the first comprises a historical overview of European music from the point of view of a Spanish humanist. Yet in each, Salazar took particular care to point out Spain's contributions to the musical world. His studies on musical instruments are most informative. He took an active interest in public affairs as shown, for example, in his opposition to national opera (1924) or his ambitious plans for a central, governmental body to sponsor the major aspects of Spain's musical life; he was embittered by the cool reception his plans received (Sopeña, 179–88).

Salazar's compositions have yet to be properly assessed. While his musical output progressed from 'Spanish-style' nationalism (Estampas, Jaculatoria) to impressionism (3 preludios, Trois Chansons de Paul Verlaine, Rubaiyat) and modernism (Deux infantines, Paisajes), Salazar came to realize by the close of the third decade that a new generation of composers in Spain and abroad were already fulfilling the high expectations he had for contemporary music.

Salazar, Alvaro (Rodrigues) (b Oporto, 2 March 1938). Portuguese composer and conductor. He studied at the Lisbon Conservatory with Armando José Fernandes, and also took a degree in law. He later continued his musical studies in France with Amy, Dervaux and Swarowsky, and completed the conducting course at the Ecole Normale. In 1987 he founded the group Oficina Musical, with whom he has performed much contemporary music and given many first performances. He was conductor of the Estoril Festival Chamber Group (1979–85). He is president of the Portuguese Music Council and an executive member of the Sociedade Portuguesa de Autores. He teaches at the Escola Superior de Música e de Artes do Espectáculo in Oporto and at the Lisbon Conservatory.

He was one of the first composers in Portugal to make a specific study of electronic music. As a composer, he has written principally for chamber groups. Although frequently labelled a serialist, he does not use these principles; nevertheless, his music is serially influenced and strictly atonal.

CHRISTOPHER BOCHMANN

Salazar, Antonio de (b Puebla, *c*1650; d Mexico City, 25 March 1715). Mexican composer. According to Estrada, he (or someone of the same name) sought admission to the capilla of Mexico City Cathedral as a player of the bajón in November 1672. He was turned down, but may have been appointed to the post at some later date. On 20 June 1679 Salazar applied for the position of maestro de capilla at Puebla Cathedral, identifying himself as a resident of Puebla. After a rigorous examination in every facet of performance and composition, he was appointed maestro de capilla on 11 July. His duties included giving a daily one-hour lesson in polyphonic music to the entire cathedral music staff, and he was also ordered to deposit copies of his compositions in the cathedral archive. At the same time the authorities offered him remuneration of 64 pesos for villancicos and chanzonetas already composed.

At Puebla Salazar composed Latin motets and hymns as well as many villancicos for special feasts, including five sets to texts by Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz for the feasts of Christmas 1678 and 1680, St Peter the Apostle 1680 and 1683 and the Assumption 1681. In August 1688 he entered the competition for the post of maestro de capilla at Mexico City, and after demonstrating his abilities in plainchant, counterpoint and the composition of a motet and a villiancico, he was appointed on 3 September, receiving more than twice as many votes as the nearest of his four rivals for the position. His annual salary was 500 pesos with the opportunity to earn more for extra duties. He was also given the services of a copyist and a quantity of music paper. His place at Puebla was taken by Miguel Dallo y Lana.

In Mexico City Salazar found the cathedral music archive to be in a lamentable state, with many works missing altogether, and he set about reorganizing it. In 1692 he also helped to supervise the installation of a new organ built in Madrid by Jorge de Sesma; it was placed on the Epistle side of the cathedral. A significant number of Salazar's villancicos remain. They include movements based on popular dance and song forms such as the folía, jácara, kalenda, negro, ensaladilla and juguete. In the 1691 villancicos for the feast of St Peter, attributed to Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz, there are references to many instruments – clarín, trompeta, sacabuche, cornett, organ, bajón, violin, chirimía, trumpet marine, cítara, violón, tenor, vihuela, rabelillo, bandurria and harp – and it is possible that some of these were included in Salazar's scores. Salazar's villancicos to texts by Sor Juana for Mexico City Cathedral include those for St Peter the Apostle 1690 and 1692 and for the Assumption 1690. The ensalada that concludes the 1690 villancicos for the Assumption includes a juguete and quotes the popular tune Yo voy con todo la artillería in the jácara. In his two-voice negro Tarara tarara qui yo soy Antoniyo and other vernacular works Salazar demonstrated his ability at writing popular semi-theatrical pieces in black dialect.

Salazar's sacred Latin works show a mature command of counterpoint. His double-choir O sacrum convivium uses imitation, antiphonal writing and rhythmic vitality to fine effect, and in Quis Deus magnus the contrasting of major and minor modes and the use of initial upbeats are distinctive. In the six-part Inveni David a tenor soloist alternates with four-part chorus and two continuo lines (probably played on one or two organs, dulcians and possibly harp).

Salazar's compositions were disseminated throughout New Spain, and are found today in archives in Guatemala, Mexico City, Morelia, Oaxaca, Puebla and Tepotzotlán. Many of his villancicos survive in Mexico City Cathedral and in the Sánchez Garza Collection in the Centro Nacional de Investigación y Documentación Musical 'Carlos Chávez', Mexico City, which originated in the music archive of the Convento de la SS Trinidad in Puebla. The parts for Angelicos coros con gozo cantad name the nuns who originally performed the music. Male teachers and musicians were sometimes called in to examine or instruct nuns and novices. In 1712, in the Convento de S Jerónimo, Salazar examined and attested to the musical abilities of Josepha de Torres Moctezuma on the harp and organ. Stevenson (1996, pp.23–37) has suggested that Salazar, Francisco López Capillas and Joseph de Agurto y Loaysa gave Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz musical instruction at the Convento de S Jerónimo. Salazar's other pupils included José Pérez de Guzmán, who became maestro de capilla at Oaxaca Cathedral, and Manuel Francisco de Cárdenas from Guadalajara, who remained in Mexico City as a singer.

In 1710 the cathedral authorities agreed to Salazar's petition to cease his duties as teacher of counterpoint and canto figurado to the choirboys since, at the age of 60, he was almost blind and in poor health. During his illness his pupil Manuel de Zumaya deputized for him as director of music at the cathedral, and also collaborated with him in composing four Latin hymns (in MEX-Mc Choirbook V), Salazar writing the first parts of Egregie Doctor Paule, Christe sanctorum decus and Miris modis repente liber and the second part of O crux ave spes unica.

Salazar died intestate on 25 March 1715 in his house on Calle Tabuca, leaving his widow Doña Antonia de Cáceres. In recognition of his importance he was buried in Mexico City Cathedral. Zumaya succeeded him as maestro de capilla.

JOHN KOEGEL

Salazar, Diego José [Joseph] de (d Seville, 25 June 1709). Spanish composer. After being a choirboy at Seville Cathedral he became maestro de capilla at the nearby village of Estepa. He was recalled to Seville on 26 November 1685 to succeed Alonso Xuárez (probably his teacher) as cathedral maestro de capilla. He wrote a requiem for Carlos II's wife María Luisa de Orleáns (d 12 February 1689) that was used for many later important funerals. He died of the plague, aged about 50.

When catalogued in 1904 the music archive at Seville Cathedral contained an orchestral mass, a Credo, four motets, Lamentations, 23 folders of miscellaneous works and three books of elaborated accompaniments by Salazar; in addition Choirbook CXV contained his hymn for SS Justus and Pastor, Appetunt cursus et inde. At least seven instrumentally accompanied villancicos, for one to eight voices, attesting to his picaresque wit and keen sense of drama, were housed in Latin American archives during the late 1960s (see Stevenson). Printed texts of his villancico suites are contained in 23 booklets in the Biblioteca Nacional, Madrid.

Salbinger [Salblinger], Sigmund. See SALMINGER, SIGMUND.

Saldívar y Silva, Gabriel (b Jiménez in Tamaulipas, 5 Sept 1909; d Mexico City, 18 Dec 1980). Mexican musicologist, music collector and historian. Self-taught in music and with an interest in all aspects of Mexican music and history (he was a noted historian of his home state of Tamaulipas), Saldívar made his greatest contribution to Mexican musical scholarship with the book, written in collaboration with his wife Elena Osorio Bolio, Historia de la música en México (épocas precortesiana y colonial). This work of lasting importance was the first history of music in Mexico to be based upon extensive archival study. His monograph El jarabe, besides presenting a documentary history of this important Mexican dance form, includes valuable facsimiles of early jarabes in manuscript and printed form, taken mostly from the Saldívar Collection, which he formed together with his wife. This is one of the largest private music collections in Latin America and consists of an important group of musical manuscripts, as well as a significant collection of Mexican sheet music and publications relating to Mexican music and music in Mexico. It has provided the impetus for important study, most notably Russell's edition and study of the Santiago de Murcía manuscript of Baroque guitar music. The Códice Saldívar no.2, a Método de Cítara copied by Sebastián de Aguirre in Puebla around 1650, is also of special interest. Saldívar's Bibliografía mexicana de musicología y musicografía serves as a preliminary guide to his extensive collection, with many annotated entries from the 16th–20th centuries.

JOHN KOEGEL

Saldoni (y Remendo), Baltasar (b Barcelona, 4 Jan 1807; d Madrid, 3 Dec 1889). Spanish composer and musicologist. A choirboy successively at S María del Mar in Barcelona, the chapel of S María del Pino and the Escolanía at Montserrat, Saldoni studied the piano and organ in his native city with Mateo Ferrer and composition with Francisco Queralt. His early compositions included short religious pieces and an operetta, El triunfo del amor (1826). In 1829 he moved to Madrid where he was encouraged by a fellow Catalan, Ramón Carnicer, who secured his appointment as a teacher at the Royal Conservatory on its foundation in 1830. He wrote several works on vocal technique which were praised in Spain and France. Among his operas in the Italian tradition, his greatest success was with Ipermestra (1838). His creative career declined after 1840, but in 1848 he was appointed musical director of the Teatro del Príncipe and encouraged Barbieri, Gaztambide, Inzenga and Oudrid at the beginning of their careers. Disappointed by public indifference to his work, he finally abandoned the theatre and devoted his last years to the compilation of his Diccionario biográfico-bibliográfico de efemérides de músicos españoles, which in spite of its faults is enormously important for the history of Spanish music. In this extensive work entries are ordered chronologically rather than alphabetically; its biggest defect is the inclusion of too many relatively unimportant figures, which crowd the text. Nonetheless, it contains many facts which cannot be found elsewhere, and its use is greatly facilitated by the modern index.

GILBERT REANEY

Salé [Salle], Adrien Trudo [Trudon] (b St Truiden, Limburg, bap. 6 June 1722; d Averbode, Brabant, 19 March 1782). Flemish organist and composer. He entered the Premonstratensian monastery of Averbode on 2 February 1745 and was ordained priest there in 1748, later becoming librarian and Kantor; his manuscripts indicate that he was also probably the organist there. A few years later he studied theology at the Premonstratensian college at Leuven, after which he returned to Averbode and became a provisor, later an abbot and finally the vicar-general for the district of Brabant. He was probably better known as a performer than as a composer. He wrote some rather primitive accompaniments to plainsong and may have written only the accompaniments to the other compositions associated with his name, three masses and two motets, all in manuscript at the Abbey of Averbode.

Sales [Sale, Salec, Saletz], Franz [François] (b Namur, ?*c*1540; d Prague, 15 July 1599). Dutch composer. In his 1589 publication he stated that he was the son of 'Hans Saletz von Namur', and that he left 'Belgia nostra' because of the religious conflicts. There is no proof supporting the suggestion that he was a pupil of Lassus. After two unsuccessful attempts in 1579 and 1580 to obtain an appointment at the court chapel in Stuttgart, he served at the courts of Hechingen and Munich in 1580. By 1 November 1580 he was already employed as a tenor at the court chapel in Innsbruck, where he remained until 1587. From 1587 to 1591 he held the post of Kapellmeister at the collegiate foundation for ladies of noble families at Hall in Tirol. Subsequently he served from 1 May 1591 until his death as a tenor in the imperial court of Rudolf II at Prague under Philippe de Monte.

His compositions, many of which were published, are mainly sacred choral works; sacred and secular songs of his also appeared in printed collections published between 1585 and 1604. His importance lies largely in his writing of Mass Propers. His cyclic treatment of the introit, alleluia and communion, based on the plainsong cantus firmi, constitute, together with works by Johannes de Cleve, Christian Erbach and Johann Knöfel, the last great Renaissance collection of Mass Propers in Germany. Like Cleve, Sales adhered to strictly conservative principles and wrote much music in an intricate and richly polyphonic style. Like Cleve also he wrote simple 'song' masses. The Missa 'Exultandi tempus est' is such a work; it is in triple time throughout, and is based on the composer's own chanson motet of the same name, which has melodic links with the Christmas song Resonet in laudibus. Both the model and the mass contain directions setting out the ways in which the versicles are to be divided between the performers. The pastoral mass, of which this is an early example, later became very popular.

HELLMUT FEDERHOFER/RUDOLF FLOTZINGER

Sales, Nikolaus (b ?Namur, before 1550; d Stuttgart, 5 April 1606). Dutch singer and composer, brother of Franz Sales. He served first as an alto and then as a tenor in the court chapel in Stuttgart from the end of 1565 until his death, with only one short interruption in 1581. There is evidence that he was employed for part of that year in the court chapel at Innsbruck. His only known work is a Komposition des Gesangs wider den Türken, but this has not survived.

HELLMUT FEDERHOFER

Sales [de Sala], Pietro Pompeo (b Brescia, 1729; d Hanau, 21 Nov 1797). Italian composer. After the early death of his parents in an earthquake he went to Innsbruck, entered the service of Baron Pircher and studied at Innsbruck University. In 1752 he composed a school drama for the Jesuits. Two years later he became conductor of an Italian opera troupe, with which he visited Cologne, Brussels, Lille and other cities. In 1756 he took charge of the court chapel of Prince-Bishop Joseph, Landgrave of Hesse-Darmstadt, in Augsburg and Dillingen an der Donau. He travelled widely as a performer and composer, becoming a member of the Bologna Accademia Filarmonica (1758) and composing an oratorio for Mannheim (1762) and operas for Munich (1765) and Padua (1767). After the landgrave's death in 1768, Sales, taking with him some of the Augsburg musicians, moved to the court of the Trier Elector Clemens Wenzeslaus (who had succeeded to the title of Prince-Bishop of Augsburg) at Ehrenbreitstein am Rhein. There he headed the court chapel, one of the largest in Germany, although he was not appointed court Kapellmeister until 1787, after the death of Konrad Starck. He maintained his connection with the Munich court by composing the carnival operas in 1769 and 1774. In 1774 he married the court singer Franziska Blümer. In 1776 he appeared in London as a viol player (according to Choron and Fayolle: Dictionnaire historique des musiciens, Paris, 1810–11/R, this was his second visit), and in 1777 he performed a Passion in Frankfurt. In 1786 he moved with the elector's court to the newly built castle at Koblenz, which the court had to abandon twice (in 1792 and 1794) during the wars of the French Revolution. In 1797 he again had to flee the French and died before he could return.

Sales was a versatile composer in the current Italian style, but the care with which he wrote also reflects developments in Germany. He was well regarded as a composer in his lifetime, but a promise he had made to the elector not to publish prevented any wider distribution of his work. Schubart thought highly of Sales, although he expressed some reservations about his work in the Ideen zu einer Ästhetik der Tonkunst. It must be assumed that many of his compositions are lost. His most important surviving works are his oratorios, particularly Betulia liberata.

Saletz, Franz. See SALES, FRANZ.

Saléza, Albert (b Bruges, Pyrénées-Atlantiques, 28 Oct 1867; d Paris, 26 Nov 1916). French tenor. He studied with Saint-Yves Bax and Louis-Henri Obin at the Paris Conservatoire, and made his début at the Opéra-Comique in 1888 as Mylio in Lalo's Le roi d'Ys. After singing at Rouen, Bordeaux and Nice, he was first heard at the Paris Opéra in 1892 as Mathôs in Reyer's Salammbô; he also sang Sigurd and Siegmund (1893). At Monte Carlo in 1894 he appeared in the first performance of Franck's posthumous opera Hulda (4 March) and in Berlioz's La damnation de Faust. At the Opéra that year he sang in the première of Lefebvre's Djelma and the first Paris performance of Verdi's Otello. He made his Covent Garden début in 1898 in Gounod's Roméo et Juliette, and his Metropolitan début, again as Romeo, in the same year. He sang Rodolfo at the first Metropolitan performance of Puccini's La bohème in 1900, evoking 'a frenzy of enthusiasm' (Krehbiel). His repertory included Tannhäuser, Gounod's Faust, Raoul (Les Huguenots), Edgardo (Lucia di Lammermoor), John of Leyden (Le prophète), Masaniello, and the Duke in Rigoletto. He made a final appearance at the Opéra-Comique in 1910 as Don José. Doomed to suffer comparison with Jean de Reszke in many of his roles, he had, according to Henderson, 'a pure, mellow tenor voice of admirable quality . . . elegant diction . . . [and] the finish of the Gallic school' in his phrasing.

Salgado (Torres), Luis Humberto (b Cayambe, 10 Dec 1903; d Quito, 11 Dec 1977). Ecuadorian composer, pianist and music critic. He first studied with his father Francisco Salgado, himself a composer, then entered the Quito Conservatory in 1910. His first attempts at composition dated from 1913. As a teenager he played the piano in silent-film theatres. He graduated in piano in 1928 and in 1934 was appointed professor of solfège and harmony at the Quito Conservatory (director for two periods, beginning in 1952). Besides directing the group Camara Voz Andes, he founded and directed the symphonic ensemble of the Casa de la Cultura Ecuatoriana and conducted the orchestra and chorus of the conservatory. For many years he was the music critic of the daily El comercio, and he contributed to the Spanish journal Ritmo.

Salgado is generally considered the leading composer of his generation. He was a prolific composer, mostly of a musical nationalist persuasion, as his numerous symphonies, tone poems, concertos and operas bear witness. He also cultivated typical Ecuadorian popular genres, such as the sanjuanito and pasillo. His Sanjuanito futurista (1944) for piano combines elements of that popular genre with 12-tone technique. Many of his works are based on indigenous themes (with the omnipresent pentatonic scale) and refer to national history. His opera Cumandá (1940, revised in 1954) is set in the Amazonian provinces of Ecuador and its libretto, adapted from a novel by Juan León Mera, concerns indigenous characters.

Salicet [Salcional]. See under ORGAN STOP.

Salicus (from Lat. salire: 'to leap'). In Western chant notations a neume signifying three notes, of which the second is an ORISCUS. Usually the first and second notes are of the same pitch and the third is higher; but sometimes the three notes are of different pitches, in ascending order. As with all neumes that include the oriscus, there is doubt as to the exact significance of the salicus. The fact that the neume usually ends on F, B♭ or C has led to the suggestion that it served to orientate a melody tonally (Lipphardt). Wagner did not regard the second note as an oriscus, and interpreted its shape to mean an extra dip of a semitone before the final step upwards (four notes in all); he also suggested that the salicus ending on other degrees of the scale was suppressed when staff notation was introduced and the interval of a semitone between second and final note essential to the salicus was no longer, theoretically, available. Lipphardt saw the central element of the salicus in F-LA 239 as a letter 'a' (= altius), a belief not shared by other writers. (For illustration see NOTATION, Table 1.)

DAVID HILEY

Salieri, Antonio (b Legnago, 18 Aug 1750; d Vienna, 7 May 1825). Italian composer, mainly resident in Vienna. A major contributor to and shaper of Viennese musical life from 1770 to 1820, he also composed successful operas in Italy and Paris, and won admiration from German operagoers as a composer who, in the words of one contemporary critic, 'could bind all the power of German music to the sweet Italian style'.

1. LIFE. Born in Legnago in the Veneto, Salieri studied violin and keyboard with his brother Francesco and with a local organist, Giuseppe Simoni. After the deaths of his parents between 1763 and 1765 he was taken to Venice, where his musical education continued. The Viennese composer F.L. Gassmann, in Venice to oversee the production of his opera Achille in Sciro in 1766, noticed Salieri's talent and ambition and took the youth back to Vienna with him. Under Gassmann's direction he began an intensive programme of musical training. Described by his student Anselm Hüttenbrenner as 'the greatest musical diplomat', Salieri won the friendship of people who could help him build a career. Having earned Gassmann's paternal affection, he developed close relations with Metastasio, Gluck and Joseph II. Opportunities to write operas soon offered themselves to Salieri. When Gassmann was in Italy in 1769, Salieri set a libretto originally intended for Gassmann, Le donne letterate. Having proved himself a talented composer of opera buffa, he turned to serious opera. Armida, on a libretto by Marco Coltellini, was performed in June 1771. Salieri's ability to deal effectively with this Gluckian music drama would later, in the 1780s, make him a leading successor to Gluck as a composer of serious opera for Paris.

Salieri's success in Vienna owed much to the support of Joseph II, who was also helpful to him in Italy and France through his influence with his brothers Leopold (Grand Duke of Tuscany) and Ferdinand (governor of Lombardy) and his sister Marie Antoinette. As early as 1771 Joseph sent a copy of Armida to Leopold, reporting that it had been performed with great success in Vienna. The following year he asked Leopold about the possibility of Salieri writing an opera for Florence. When Gassmann died in 1774 Joseph appointed Salieri his successor as Kammerkomponist, an appointment that led to his also being made, at only 24 years of age, Gassmann's successor as music director of the Italian opera in Vienna. With Giovanni di Gamerra, the newly appointed theatre poet, he collaborated on two operas for the court theatres; the comedy La finta scema (1775) and the Gluckian spectacle Daliso e Delmita (1776). Neither was well received.

Joseph's reorganization of the court theatres in 1776, with its shift of emphasis to spoken drama, left Salieri with little opportunity to compose operas in Vienna, and he turned his attention to Italy. Between 1778 and 1780 he wrote five operas for theatres in Milan, Venice and Rome: these were comic operas, except for L'Europa riconosciuta, commissioned to celebrate the opening of La Scala in Habsburg-ruled Milan. Of the comic operas by far the most popular was La scuola de' gelosi, on a libretto by Caterino Mazzolà (Carnival 1779, Venice), a work that did more than any other to spread Salieri's fame throughout Europe. In 1780 Joseph II commissioned him to write a Singspiel to be performed by the Nationaltheater's German troupe: one of only two operas in German by Salieri, Der Rauchfangkehrer (1781) enjoyed considerable success until it was overshadowed by Mozart's Die Entführung aus dem Serail.

Salieri's exploration of operatic genres continued in 1782. Gluck, too weak to undertake the composition of a work commissioned by the Paris Opéra, handed the commission to Salieri. Armed with a letter of recommendation from Joseph, he went to Paris for the first time to oversee the production of Les Danaïdes (1784). Its success led to commissions for two more French operas, and during the rest of the decade Salieri divided his time and energy between composing tragédie lyrique in Paris and opera buffa in Vienna. The second of his French operas, Les Horaces, failed when it was given in 1786, but the following year he achieved one of his greatest operatic triumphs with Tarare, on a libretto by Beaumarchais.

In 1783 Joseph replaced his German troupe with one specializing in opera buffa. The new company made its début on 22 April with La scuola de' gelosi, heavily revised for a cast that included Nancy Storace and Francesco Benucci. Returning to Vienna in 1784 after the première of Les Danaïdes, Salieri busied himself with composing and directing Italian comic operas at the Burgtheater. Joseph's practice of commissioning operas from some of Europe's leading composers, Paisiello and Martín y Soler as well as Mozart, meant that Salieri faced competition that must have threatened and inspired him. Lorenzo da Ponte, recently engaged as house librettist, was his principal collaborator; he also worked with G.B. Casti. Salieri insisted on extensive revisions of Da Ponte's first libretto, Il ricco d'un giorno, including the introduction of several ensembles, the reduction of recitative and the alteration of poetic metres within aria texts. By working so closely with this inexperienced poet, he probably contributed to the strength of the librettos that Da Ponte later wrote for Mozart. His collaboration with Casti resulted in the two-act comedy La grotta di Trofonio (1785; fig.2) and a one-act satire that incorporates music of Sarti and Tarchi, Prima la musica e poi le parole (1786).

When Salieri returned to Vienna from Paris after the production of Tarare in 1787, Joseph commissioned him to prepare an Italian version of the opera for Vienna. Axur re d'Ormus, with a libretto by Da Ponte, follows the general outline of Tarare but omits much of Beaumarchais' political allegory. Much of the music is derived from Tarare, but more often than not diverges from the model. Performed in 1788 to celebrate the marriage of Archduke Franz to Princess Elisabeth of Württemberg, Axur was presented 100 times in the Viennese court theatres between 1788 and 1805.

In February 1788 Joseph granted the position of Hofkapellmeister to Salieri, who had frequently acted in that capacity since 1775 for the ailing Giuseppe Bonno. Salieri succeeded Bonno in March 1788. He remained in this office until his retirement in 1824, his tenure the longest in the history of the Hofmusikkapelle. The appointment began a new phase in Salieri's career – in the next decade he devoted himself increasingly to the administration of the court chapel and to the composition of church music.

After the death of Joseph II (20 February 1790) and with the accession of Leopold II, rumours circulated that Salieri was to be dismissed or had submitted his resignation as Hofkapellmeister. What Salieri seems to have asked for, and received, was relief from the daily chores of rehearsing and conducting opera, in exchange for which he agreed to compose a new opera each year for the court theatres. His duties in the opera house were assigned to his pupil and protégé Joseph Weigl. The 1790s left Salieri without the steadfast patronage of Joseph II, without the opportunity to write operas for Paris (cut off from him by the Revolution), without the theatrical talent of Da Ponte and without the stimulating rivalry of Mozart. In 1794 he renewed his contact with De Gamerra and together they wrote three operas for the court theatres: Eraclito e Democrito, Palmira regina di Persia and Il moro. The first and third were only moderately successful (with fewer than 20 performances in the court theatres), but Palmira achieved the greatest success of any of Salieri's late operas. His last Italian collaborator, C.P. Defranceschi, provided him with librettos for three operas performed in 1799 and 1800, including Falstaff (1799). Salieri's last complete opera, Die Neger, was given to sparse applause in 1804.

As Hofkapellmeister, Salieri attended closely to the selection of new instrumentalists and singers, filling such posts as organ builder, overseeing the acquisition of instruments and keeping the music library in good order. Hofkapelle records for the period from 1820 to Salieri's retirement in 1824 show that for regular services under his direction he most frequently chose masses by Albrechtsberger, Joseph and Michael Haydn, Georg Reutter the younger, Eybler, Leopold Hofmann and Mozart. He served as president of the Tonkünstler-Societät (founded by Gassmann to support musicians' widows and children), directing many of its concerts. In 1815 he was responsible for planning and directing musical events for the Congress of Vienna.

Salieri, who benefited so much from his teachers and mentors, devoted much of his energy to teaching, especially after retiring from operatic composition. As a teacher of singers he specialized in the development of brilliant coloratura sopranos; Catharina Cavalieri and Therese Gassmann (Florian Gassmann's daughter) were among his pupils. With Beethoven, Schubert and many other young composers who came to him for lessons he emphasized the setting of Italian poetry (especially that of Metastasio) to music.

2. WORKS. Salieri's operas, the product of over 30 years' work in Vienna, Italy and Paris, are extraordinarily rich and varied, revealing him as a composer of great versatility, vivid theatricality and considerable musical talent. As might be expected of a pupil of Gassmann and a protégé of Gluck, most of his early Italian operas fall into two categories: light, comic operas along the lines of Gassmann's settings of Goldoni's librettos and serious operas strongly influenced by tragédie lyrique. In La fiera di Venezia (1772), the most widely performed of his early comedies, he showed himself a skilful depicter of comic situations and amusing characters. This opera also documents the young Salieri's love of high coloratura soprano lines and elaborate concertante solos (Calloandra's aria 'Vi sono sposa e amante' features solos for flute, oboe and bassoon). In Armida and L'Europa riconosciuta he responded to adventurous librettos with lively, dramatic music and followed Gluck's precept (expressed in the preface to Alceste) that the overture should anticipate the drama; in both operas he gave a significant dramatic role to the chorus and demonstrated skill in the composition of accompanied recitative. A cast of virtuosos was assembled for the inauguration of La Scala, and in L'Europa riconosciuta Salieri took full advantage of their outstanding skills, writing several bravura arias of exceptional brilliance.

Salieri's two most important French operas differ greatly from one another. Les Danaïdes, to a libretto inspired by one by Calzabigi, is a gothic tale of horror and violence; Tarare is a mixture of exoticism, comedy, political allegory and romance. The music for Les Danaïdes is suitably dark, coloured with diminished 7th chords, tremolo and the sound of trombones; that for Tarare, humorous, sentimental and tragic by turn, captures the exotic spirit of Beaumarchais' libretto. Salieri handled the demands of tragédie lyrique with equal skill and craftsmanship in both operas, moving fluently between accompanied recitative, choruses, arias, ensembles and instrumental numbers. The love duets for Hypermnestra and Lynceus in Les Danaïdes are suffused with a lyricism as intense and moving as that which depicts the love of Astasie and Tarare. The brutal rage of Danaus is evoked as vividly as that of Atar, the tyrannical oriental king in Tarare. With Les Danaïdes Salieri established himself as a leading successor to Gluck in the genre of tragédie lyrique; with Tarare he helped to transform the genre.

Salieri's Viennese operas of the 1780s show that he was inspired by the same conditions that inspired Mozart during the same decade. Der Rauchfangkehrer, like Die Entführung, exemplifies the cosmopolitan character of German opera during the short life of Joseph's Singspiel company, combining elements of opera buffa, opéra comique and North German opera. In La grotta di Trofonio and La cifra Salieri expertly manipulated opera buffa conventions, using many of the singers who shaped Mozart's vocal writing in Le nozze di Figaro and Così fan tutte. The colourful and expressive solo parts for clarinets, english horns and other instruments in La grotta di Trofonio show that Salieri, like Mozart, made good use of the Burgtheater's fine orchestra (fig.3). He skilfully combined serious and comic elements, endowing Eurilla in La cifra, for example, with a nobility of character and musical style that enhances the richness and complexity of the entire opera.

Among the most successful of Salieri's Viennese operas is Axur re d'Ormus. To this five-act dramma tragicomico Salieri brought all that he had learnt as a composer of tragédie lyrique, opera seria and opera buffa. Axur has the fluidity of form characteristic of French opera, with extensive use of accompanied recitative and short, arioso vocal numbers. The music of the hero Atar and the heroine Aspasia has the kind of passionate, noble simplicity that we expect of Gluckian tragedy; but the charming commedia dell'arte scene staged in Act 4 has the lightness and wit of opera buffa.

Salieri's late operas are uneven in quality; some of the most successful, such as Palmira, look to the past, as if he were trying, near the end of his operatic career, to 30 Il mio parere sopra la musica di questa mia opera di stile Magico-buffo

nel principio della Sinfonia ho pensato dare subito un'idea dello stile dell'opera, il restante è tutto allegro come lo è tutta l'opera
L'Introduzione - Mie care figliuole - ha un carattere di bontà paterna ma allegra, e di obbedienza figliale amorosa. qualche segno lascio scorgere del naturale diverso delle due figlie, una seria per natura, l'altra per natura allegra.
Il picciolo Terzetto - Orsù, già compresi il vostro desio - è un seguito dell'Introduzione.
L'aria a Rondò - D'un dolce amor la face - ha un carattere filosofico, che conviene al per= sonaggio che la canta, e comincia sviluppare sempre più il naturale diverso delle due sorelle.
Il quartetto - Il diletto che in petto mi sento - è un continuo contrasto di allegria e di filosofica se= rietà, che spiega, unitamente a quello delle done, il naturale dei due giovani, destinati sposi ad esse.
L'aria - Da un fonte sgorga ha nel principio un accompagnamento di grandissimo effetto. Il res= tante ha bisogno d'esser detto con molta finezza, e l'aria allora comincia e finisce bene.
Il Duetto - Nello stato conjugale - non ha bisogno che d'esser graziosamente recitato e sostenendo il naturale allegro delli due personaggi, si attira applauso.
L'aria - Spiriti invisibili - con cori in fine, è puramente magica, e mi sembra che la musica ne ab= bia il giusto carattere. La voce che la canta però, per l'effetto, deve essere di gran forza e te= nebrosa.
L'aria - Di questo bosco ombroso - ha tutto il suo interesse nell'accompagnamento, e ciò deve essere perché pinge il sentimento delle parole, o ciò che s'intende in esse.

3. Autograph score of the opening of the Sinfonia from Salieri's 'La grotta di Trofonio', 1785 (A-Wn); below are some of the composer's comments on the opera written into the score recapture his earlier triumphs. Much in the spirit of Axur, Palmira mixes exoticism with comedy, spectacle with sentiment; its tender love duets, stirring marches and solemn choruses of priests delighted audiences in Vienna and throughout Germany for several years. Instrumental arrangements of the a cappella quartet 'Silenzio facciasi' made this number familiar to many of Europe's music lovers.

Salieri's sacred music consists of about 100 settings of Latin liturgical texts, including four orchestral masses, one a cappella mass, a Requiem, about 45 graduals and offertories, three Te Deum and two Magnificat settings, and psalms, hymns, litanies, introits and miscellaneous motets. Each of the major works seems to have been intended for a special event. The first orchestral mass (1788), which coincided with his appointment as Hofkapellmeister, was meant to honour the emperor's return from the Turkish war. The Mass in C (1799), a festive, double-chorus score, was performed on 8 December 1804 at the ceremony whereby Francis II became Francis I of Austria. Earlier that year, Salieri composed a Requiem that he designated for his own funeral. Unlike his operas, Salieri's sacred music was not widely disseminated, partly because the composer himself declared it to be 'for God and my emperor'. As the presiding musician for Habsburg religious ceremony, he upheld the liturgical ideals of comprehensibility and simplicity articulated by the church in the papal encyclical Annus qui (1749) and reinforced in Joseph's reforms of 1783 and 1786. His liturgical music avoids the vocal virtuosity and operatic contrafacta that had invaded church music in the late 18th century. The mature works (after 1788) stress a dramatic, lyric and declamatory role for the chorus, modest use of the solo voice, a diminishing place for the still traditional contrapuntal styles and growing influence of modern symphonic techniques. Certain of Salieri's offertories and graduals became staples of the Hofkapelle repertory: Populi timete (1778), Liberasti nos Domine (1799), Veni Sancte Spiritus (1805) and Confirma hoc Deus (1809) were performed there regularly throughout the 19th century and into the 20th.

Salieri's instrumental music comprises a small part of his output, mostly composed early, and dominated by smaller genres (serenades, suites, marches) and featuring wind ensembles. During the 1770s he wrote several concertos, including one for flute and oboe which has become familiar through many recordings, and one symphony. His last major instrumental work is a set of 26 colourfully orchestrated variations on La folia (1815). Many of his opera overtures circulated as independent symphonies, and a number of three-movement sinfonias consist of movements from different overtures recombined by unknown hands.

Salii (Lat.: 'dancers'). Company (sodalitas) of priests in ancient Rome and other Italian cities responsible for certain rites, especially those of Mars. Two such companies existed at Rome, the Salii Palatini and Salii Collini, each with 12 members. On certain prescribed days in March and October they held a procession, with stations at which they performed tripudia (ritual dances characterized by threefold stamping) and sang the carmen saliare or axamenta probably in responsorial fashion. It was an archaic ritual hymn, unintelligible even in Republican times. Fragments of its text survive but do not permit a reconstruction of the original.

Salimbene de Adam [Salimbene da Parma] (b Parma, 1221; d 1288). Italian chronicler. A Franciscan, he lived at various places in central Italy and made several journeys to France. His Chronicle narrates historical events from 1167 to 1287 in a lively style, and also contains autobiographical details, some of which are of particular interest for the history of music in Italy in the mid-13th century. Salimbene had been taught singing by two brother friars, Fra Enrico da Pisa and Fra Vita da Lucca. He quoted the first lines of many poems written and set to music by Fra Enrico, and recalled Fra Vita's skill in adapting a contracantus to a cantus – that is, in composing polyphonic music. In the course of the work he mentioned the musical talent of a number of people, for example Emperor Frederick II, of whom he said that he could sing and compose cantilene and cantiones, and Fra Guidolinus Ianuarius da Parma, who he said sang secular songs very well. There are also descriptions of musical performances. During Carnival at Reggio people sang and danced in the street ('in strata publica choreiçando cantabant'). A group of young people performed in a courtyard at Pisa:

'Both the men and the women held vielle and cythare and other sorts of instruments in their hands, and they made sweet melody ['modulos'] with them and made appropriate gestures. There was no noise, and no one spoke; all listened in silence. The song they sang was very unusual and beautiful, both in its words and in the variety of voices and the way of singing, so that our hearts were exceedingly delighted'.

F. ALBERTO GALLO

Salinas, Francisco [Franciscus] de (b Burgos, 1 March 1513; d Salamanca, 13 Jan 1590). Spanish theorist and organist. Son of a treasury official for Emperor Charles V, Salinas became blind as a child and was given organ and singing lessons to provide him with a means of livelihood. Once proficient, he gave organ lessons to a young woman in exchange for Latin lessons and later studied philosophy, Greek and liberal arts at the University of Salamanca. He was probably a pupil of Hernán Núñez, who taught Greek and rhetoric there between 1523 and 1548.

About 1537, interrupting university studies because of his family's finances, he entered the service of Pedro Gómez Sarmiento de Villandrando, Archbishop of Santiago de Compostela (elevated to cardinal on 18 October 1538). Salinas accompanied the cardinal to Rome, where he embarked on a study of music theory, dedicating himself particularly to the ancient Greek authors and Boethius. He must have employed an assistant who could read and write Greek and Latin for him. Lowinsky (1961) suggested this was Gaspar Stoquerus, a German pupil and later assistant of Salinas at the University of Salamanca. In the preface to his book, De musica libri septem, Salinas related that he had studied manuscript versions of the Harmonics by Claudius Ptolemy in the Vatican Library, Porphyry's commentary on them (from the library of the Cardinal of Carpi), two books of the Harmonic Elements of Aristoxenus, two books by Nicomachus (probably the Arithmetic and the manual on music), whom, he correctly said, Boethius followed, a book by Bacchius, three by Aristides Quintilianus and three by Manuel Bryennius, the latter transcribed for him from the library of S Marco in Venice through the Cardinal of Burgos. Salinas elsewhere also cited the treatises of Euclid and Cleonides (both as works of Euclid), the introduction by Gaudentius and the De musica then attributed to Plutarch.

After the death of Cardinal Sarmiento (13 October 1541), Salinas was supported by several other cardinals, among them Rodolfo Pio di Carpi and Francisco de Mendoza. Salinas was ordained priest during this time, and on 31 January 1544 was awarded a benefice of 40 gold ducats a year in S María in Ubeda and another in the parish of S Esteban del Collado, both in the diocese of Jaén; in May 1546 he received an additional benefice at the abbey and church of S María in the diocese of Burgos. While in Rome he became friendly with Francesco da Milano and Bartholomé de Escobedo. Pope Paul III (d 1549) named him abbot of S Pancrazio de Rocca Scalegna in the kingdom of Naples. From 1553 to 1558 Salinas was organist of the viceregal chapel at Naples under Diego Ortiz.

On 7 January 1559 Salinas was elected organist at Sigüenza Cathedral. On 5 May 1563 he was offered 90,000 maravedís a year to be organist of the cathedral of Léon. After negotiating a higher salary, he accepted and held the position until 1567. That year, after an open competition, he was appointed on 21 January to the chair of theoretical and practical music at the University of Salamanca. Salinas was awarded the Master of Arts degree there on 7 November 1569. He retired from his university position in 1587 but continued to teach.

What Boethius had set out to do in the 6th century and Franchinus Gaffurius in the 15th, Salinas proposed to accomplish for his century in the De musica: to sum up the knowledge of the theory of music communicated by the best authors of the ancient past and recent times. Whereas Boethius and Gaffurius accepted the principle that music was subordinate to mathematics – for them the only means by which the truth could be known and demonstrated – Salinas demanded that the findings of mathematics be verified by the sense of hearing. Another difference is that Boethius and Gaffurius communicated uncritically the theories of others, while Salinas subjected them to a rigorous critique and found some of them deficient. Unlike Glarean, who applied bits and pieces of ancient Greek theory to modern musical systems, Salinas sought to understand the Greek theoretical systems on their own terms.

Salinas's treatise is exceptional for his time because beyond the first book, which is on number, proportion and proportionality generally, the remaining books are evenly divided between harmonics and rhythmics (books 2–4 on harmonics, 5–7 on rhythmics). More specifically, book 2 is on intervals, 3 on the genera and divisions of the monochord, and 4 on the modes. Book 5 is on rhythm, 6 on metre, and 7 on verse. Salinas limited himself to musica theorica, offering no instruction in counterpoint or composition. Nevertheless, he aimed to serve the practising musician, and this is particularly evident in his treatment of instrumental tuning and temperament.

Salinas regarded the ancient authors as authorities rather than as theorists operating within particular historical contexts. Thus, if they did not support the modern view of consonance or the tuning of the scale, they must be seen as committing error. For example, the Pythagorean division of the tetrachord, which produces a major 3rd in the ratio 81:64 rather than the 'just' one of 5:4, was not simply archaic but mistaken. Like Fogliano and Zarlino before him, Salinas preferred the 'just' size of the major and minor 3rds and 6ths. Similarly, Salinas criticized Aristoxenus and Ptolemy for leaving a gap in their chromatic tetrachords, as in the series B, D, E♭, E♮. His solution was to make the entire tetrachord dense with semitones; his enharmonic is divided into microtones throughout.

Salinas was the first clearly to differentiate in a printed work between the modes of plainchant and the Greek system of harmoniae and tonoi. The modern modes, he believed, were analogous to the ancient harmoniae, which were essentially species of octave, that is distinctive arrangements of tones and semitones. The tonoi, however, were constitutions of notes that remained the same whether sung at a higher or lower pitch level (bk 4, ch.12, p.198).

Salinas's books on rhythmics have received the greatest attention because of the more than 50 popular Castilian songs cited to illustrate various metres, constituting an important anthology of 16th-century folklore. The transmission of the songs was incidental to Salinas's purpose, which was to treat the neglected discipline of rhythmics in the most concrete way possible. Salinas distinguished metre from rhythm by saying that metre is to rhythm as mode is to melody. A metre contains a determinate number of feet, whereas a rhythm results from joining an indeterminate number of feet. Both are combinations of long and short durations. The application of the ancient metres to poetry that was not quantitative but rather measured through stress accent and syllable count, was a conscious transference of the dynamics of long and short syllable length to that of strong and weak accent. Salinas's principal sources for rhythmic theory were Aristides Quintilianus's De musica [Peri mousikēs], Terentianus Maurus (De litteris, syllabis et metris), Victorinus (Ars grammatica), Bede (De arte metrica), and most of all Augustine (De musica). Among the modern sources was Antonio de Lebrixa's Grammatica de la lengua castellana (Salamanca, 1492).

CLAUDE V. PALISCA

Salinger, Conrad (b ?1900; d BelAir, CA, ?17 June 1962). American orchestrator and composer. Part of lyricist Arthur Freed's production unit at MGM, Salinger orchestrated some of the greatest film musicals released during the 1940s and 50s. The unit's first project was Meet Me in St. Louis (1944) directed by Vincente Minnelli, with songs by Hugh Martin and Ralph Blane. Salinger orchestrated the score within musical adaptation by Roger Edens and musical direction by George Stoll and Lennie Hayton. The musical featured songs that were integrated into the narrative fabric, rather than following the show-stopping Broadway tradition: Salinger shared producer Freed's desire to blend the timbre of the songs with that of the soundtrack as a whole. He used about 36 musicians instead of the 100-strong orchestra usually employed for film musicals. He also worked on other classic film musicals such as The Wizard of Oz (1939), Easter Parade (1948), Seven Brides for Seven Brothers (1954) and Gigi (1958), and he received an Academy Award nomination, with Adolph Deutsch, for his musical direction of Show Boat (1951). Salinger was also involved in the 1952 remake of David Selznick's 1937 film The Prisoner of Zenda. He used the principal themes from Alfred Newman's original score, but critics have described his re-orchestration and placement of the melodies as more dramatically effective than the original.

Salinis, Hymbert [Hubertus] de. See HYMBERT DE SALINIS.

Salisbury. City in England. The foundation stone of the present cathedral was laid in 1220, and building was completed in 1266. Until the Reformation, the form of liturgy in the cathedral was known as Sarum Use (see SALISBURY, USE OF) and was widely adopted throughout England. Among post-Reformation organists may be mentioned the John Farrants, elder and younger, and Michael Wise, and there are local connections with the Lawes family and Adrian Batten.

It was to hear music that George Herbert walked twice weekly into Salisbury and afterwards took part in private music meetings. The 'Society of Lovers of Musick' celebrated St Cecilia's Day in the cathedral in 1700 and probably annually thereafter. In 1740 the society subscribed to Handel's 'Twelve Grand Concertos' op.6, and St Cecilia's Day was celebrated 'as usual' with a concert at the Assembly Room in New Street (replaced in 1750 by one in the High Street). A Te Deum and two anthems by Handel were performed in the morning in the cathedral. Handel oratorios were given at virtually every festival from 1748. The festivals, held over two days from 1748, and three from 1768, took place annually until 1789 when the closure of the cathedral led to their suspension until 1792. Further festivals took place in 1800, 1804, 1807, 1810, 1813, 1818, 1821 and 1824. A four-day festival in 1828 terminated this event.

The Musical Society also organized regular concerts throughout the year, when musicians from London appeared and the newest music was performed. Mainly owing to its director James Harris, it was the finest society outside London, and performers included Mr Charles, the first named performer on the clarinet in Britain (1743), Signora Avoglio (1746), Abel (1759), Elizabeth Linley (from 1769), Nancy Storace (first in 1773, aged seven), J.C. Bach (1773), Crotch (aged eight, 1783) and Bridgetower (1794). Handel's librettist Thomas Morell was probably present at a performance of Jephtha in 1760, 'never play'd before out of London'. Salisbury musicians contributed a great deal to the concerts, providing first-class singers from the cathedral, and in 1784 the orchestra was said to be 'filled from this city alone'. William Mahon was first violin from about 1786 until 1816. Thomas Norris (*c*1741–90), a chorister from 1752, became the finest English tenor of his day.

The society declined after the deaths in 1780 of both James Harris and John Stephens, cathedral organist from 1746. Disputing factions, supporting his successor, Robert Parry, and the society's elected conductor, Joseph Corfe, disrupted musical life in the city. The end of the festivals also marked the end of the Musical Society.

Salisbury remains a minor regional music centre and makes much of its own music, despite the absence of a concert hall. In 1991 Salisbury Cathedral was one of the first in England to establish a girls' choir, which participates regularly in choral services. Together with Winchester and Chichester, Salisbury has taken part since 1904 in the Southern Cathedrals Festivals.

Salisbury ['Sarum'], Use of. The customs, liturgy and chant of the medieval cathedral of Salisbury ('Sarum' is an incorrect expansion of the contracted form of 'Sarisburia', the Latin name for Salisbury). Sarum chant and liturgy were paramount in later medieval England, and much English sacred polyphony of the period was performed within its context. The modern fame of the Use of Sarum is to a great extent an accidental product of the political and religious preoccupations of 19th-century English ecclesiastics and ecclesiologists. The Use certainly deserves attention and respect as an outstanding intellectual achievement, but it is far from unique, and the fascination that it has exerted still threatens to limit rather than increase our understanding of the medieval English Church.

1. Definition of 'Use'. 2. History of the Salisbury Use: (i) Origins (ii) Development: the ordinal, consuetudinary and customary (iii) Dissemination. 3. Service books and chant. 4. Polyphony.

1. DEFINITION OF 'USE'. A Use is a body of custom sufficiently distinctive and defined to be identified with a particular ecclesiastical foundation or group of foundations such as a cathedral church and its diocesan churches or with a religious order such as the Cistercians or Dominicans. Though not confined to the later Middle Ages, the concept of Use was thoroughly exploited during this period because it was well attuned to contemporary attitudes and conditions: the prominent role of the Church; the elaborateness of the liturgy; the desire to create and codify minutely ordered systems; and the strength of regionalism.

A medieval Use typically involved three aspects of a religious community's existence: its constitution (its operation as a corporate body, and the duties and privileges of its members); its liturgy (the ritual and ceremonial, or content and conduct, of its worship); and the repertory of chant to which its liturgy was sung. These aspects were interrelated: the main purpose of most religious foundations was to perform the liturgy on behalf of the rest of society; the intricate liturgy demanded a high degree of expertise if it was to be performed in a manner worthy of its object; and the liturgy exploited the music of the chant subtly, thoroughly and resourcefully.

2. History of the Salisbury Use.

(i) Origins. Although the diocese of Salisbury was a post-Conquest creation, its roots lay in Anglo-Saxon England. In 635 St Birinus converted Cynegils, king of Wessex, to Christianity and became the first bishop of the West Saxons, establishing his see at Dorchester-on-Thames and subsequently founding several other churches, including one at Winchester. It may have been the threat of Mercian intrusion that prompted Cynegils' successor Cenwalh to make Winchester the seat of a second diocese; in about 660 Dorchester itself ceased to be a bishopric, leaving Winchester as the sole see of the West Saxon kingdom. The westward expansion of Wessex soon made it impossible for its church to be administered from a single centre. In 705 a western diocese was founded at Sherborne, and in 909 three more bishoprics were created, at Crediton, Ramsbury and Wells; Ramsbury was united with Sherborne in 1058. In 1075 William the Conqueror moved the see of Sherborne to Old Sarum, where he transformed an ancient hill-fort into a stronghold and administrative centre. Less than a century and a half later, however, the settlement was transferred to a more favourable site beside the River Avon two miles to the south, which became known as New Sarum or Salisbury. Here a new cathedral was built between about 1220 and 1266. Its diocese corresponded roughly to the counties of Berkshire, Dorset, and Wiltshire.

The observable history of the Use of Salisbury begins with the appointment of Bishop Osmund in 1078. Osmund was more than just another of the foreign ecclesiastics chosen by William to bring the English Church into conformity with Norman models: he was a Norman aristocrat, son of the Count of Sées; he was William's own nephew and had accompanied him to England in 1066; he had been his chaplain and, since 1072, his chancellor. He quickly proved himself an energetic and effective bishop. By 1089 Osmund had converted his cathedral church from a Benedictine monastery into a house of secular canons, and in 1091 he provided the community with a written constitution. Such steps had ample precedent; radical reform had been taking place in the English Church since the appointment of Lanfranc to Canterbury in 1070, and in 1090 two of Osmund's compatriot bishops, Thomas of Bayeux and Remigius of Fécamp, had enacted similar constitutional legislation at York and Lincoln.

Osmund's ordinances for his new cathedral, preserved in two documents known as the Charta Osmundi and the Institutio Osmundi, are almost entirely concerned with its finances and the duties of its senior clergy. Since the earliest surviving service book from Salisbury (the unnotated gradual GB-SB 149) postdates Osmund by about a century, and the earliest chant books postdate him by half as long again, his contribution to the cathedral's liturgy and chant is a matter for conjecture. He must surely have been an innovator, for the replacement of a monastic community with a secular chapter was bound to have liturgical consequences. Revisions were certainly being made to the liturgies of other English churches, such as Canterbury, where Lanfranc imported customs from Bec. If liturgical changes were made, they may, but need not, have been accompanied by the adoption of new chant and/or methods of chanting. At Glastonbury, Abbot Thurstan of Caen caused a riot by introducing Norman chant or chanting, whereas at Canterbury pre-Conquest versions of at least some of the chants evidently continued to be used within Lanfranc's revised liturgy.

The origins of Sarum liturgy and chant and the evolution of the Use during the 12th century are thus very obscure. Presumably Osmund's written constitution was amplified from time to time, the liturgy was established and developed and perhaps recorded in outline, and the chant was sung and transmitted in versions considered authentic and definitive. GB-SB 149 shows that the Mass liturgy was already formed half a century before the first extant chant books. When they are encountered in documents of the early 13th century, both the liturgy and the chant show close connections with Norman models, particularly with Rouen, but the extent (if any) to which they retain pre-Norman elements is unknown.

(ii) Development: the ordinal, consuetudinary and customary. The resettlement at New Sarum coincided with major developments in the Use. By this time there was evidently a need for a detailed and orderly description of the cathedral's liturgical customs. This was supplied by Richard Poore, a zealous organiser who, as dean of Salisbury from 1197 to 1215 and bishop from 1217 to 1228, presided over the move to the new site and the beginning of work on the new cathedral. It was probably during his deanship that Poore, perhaps in emulation of northern French practice, provided his cathedral with two treatises that constitute the earliest comprehensive account of the Salisbury liturgy: the ordinal and consuetudinary. Although these overlap, they are essentially complementary: the ordinal is a directory of the services, listing their constituent items and describing the method of service day by day; the consuetudinary is an analysis of ceremonial, prescribing basic liturgical conduct and departures from it on particular occasions, and setting out the duties of the participants according to the type of service and grade of feast. These are not service books, but reference books for the precentor. The ordinal quickly came to be considered part of the essential equipment of every parish church in the diocese, being frequently mentioned in visitation records from the 1220s onwards.

The Sarum ordinal and consuetudinary were periodically revised in response to such factors as the adoption of new feasts, changes in liturgical fashion and the need for greater precision. Alterations were often made piecemeal by addition or small-scale emendation, but occasionally more radical revision was necessary. In about 1246 the consuetudinary was restructured on a chronological basis and its ceremonial material was greatly amplified. As the basic handbook to the services, the ordinal was subject to greater alteration than the consuetudinary; by the mid-14th century it had reached such a state of confusion that a wholesale revision, known as the new ordinal, was produced. The new ordinal then became the main source for the rubrics in later Sarum service books. Unlike the ordinal, the consuetudinary seems to have fallen into disuse early in the 14th century, doubtless because much of its contents applied only to the cathedral and a great deal of the rest was duplicated in the ordinal. With its constitutional content abbreviated, its material on general liturgical deportment kept and its instructions about the Divine Office expanded, it was turned into a new reference book known as the customary; this seems to have been intended for parish churches, and it was often copied as a supplement to the ordinal.

During the 15th century the revised ordinal was itself criticized for its complexity, and the authorities at Salisbury were accused of not understanding their own liturgy. Particularly cogent and influential criticism came from Clement Maydeston, a monk of Syon, in three treatises: Directorium sacerdotum (*c*1440), Defensorium directorii (*c*1448) and Crede michi (*c*1452). The first of these resolved contradictions and clarified obscurities in the standard ordinal; the second reinforced the Directorium by exposing discrepancies between the ordinal and contemporary interpretations of it; and the third went into further detail and revealed the inadequacy of replies made by the canons of Salisbury to liturgical questions asked of them. The Directorium and its supplementary tracts seem quickly to have been accepted as authoritative, circulating in manuscript and being printed at least four times between 1487 and 1495; a revision by William Clerke, precentor of King's College, Cambridge, was then printed a further seven times between 1497 and 1508, before being made redundant in 1509 by the incorporation of its rubrics into the breviary itself.

(iii) Dissemination. During the later Middle Ages the Use of Salisbury became influential both within and occasionally also outside the British Isles. Its diffusion began in the 12th century, when the cathedral's reputation for good constitutional practice prompted Lincoln, Chichester, Lichfield and probably Wells to introduce legislation based on the Institutio Osmundi or on amplifications of it. The advent of the ordinal and consuetudinary (perhaps also the production of service books) encouraged further borrowing and shifted the emphasis from constitution to liturgy. During the 13th century the Sarum liturgy was adopted either partly or wholly, and often with the retention of local elements, by St Patrick's (Dublin), St David's, Elgin and Wells, and also by some collegiate foundations in dioceses whose cathedrals were monastic. It also left its mark on the revision of the Dominican rite carried out in 1244–6. The process of dissemination continued in the 14th century: Exeter and to a lesser extent Hereford borrowed from Salisbury, and Sarum Use became standard for household chapels and academic colleges. It even travelled to Portugal when Philippa of Lancaster, daughter of John of Gaunt, married João I in 1387, and some features were retained in the Use of Braga for a considerable time. During the 15th century the Use was accepted by London and Lichfield, and early in the 16th Exeter adopted it in its entirety. The only diocese largely untouched by Salisbury was York. Hereford's claim to independence is weakened by its ordinal and even more by its missal and breviary. By the early 1500s Salisbury Use had been adopted by most of the southern and Midlands dioceses, and in 1542 it attained the zenith of its influence when Canterbury Convocation imposed it upon the entire southern province of the English Church. Seven years later, however, it was replaced by the English liturgy of the first Book of Common Prayer. It was briefly reinstated by Mary (1553–8), but the Elizabethan religious settlement of 1559 brought about its final abandonment, although it continued to be used by members of the English College at Douai until about 1577.

The ascendancy of the Use of Sarum was at least partly fortuitous. The cathedral churches of several English dioceses, including Canterbury, the mother church of England, and Winchester, leader of the late Saxon ecclesiastical revival, were Benedictine priories, and their monastic liturgies were unsuitable for their diocesan churches. Organized so thoroughly and so early, Salisbury was well able to fill the gap; once begun, colonization created its own momentum. Other explanations of Salisbury Use's success, such as its adoption by household chapels and chantry and academic colleges, and the ability of copyists and booksellers to supply Salisbury service books on demand, are more likely to be results than causes.

3. Service books and chant. The fact that the earliest surviving manuscripts of Sarum chant, such as the graduals GB-Lbl 12194 and Ob Rawl.lit.d.3 and the antiphoner Cu Mm.2.9, date from the second quarter of the 13th century may imply that Poore's work on the ordinal and consuetudinary was part of a larger project to codify the cathedral's liturgical heritage. Like the ordinal and consuetudinary, the service books were subject to revision in response to liturgical evolution. Among additions and changes which may help to date a manuscript are: the Deposition and Translation of St Edmund of Abingdon (1246 and 1247); the octave of the Nativity of the Blessed Virgin (1252); the transference of the Feast of Relics from 15 September to the Sunday following the Translation of St Thomas (1319); St Anne (1383); Sts David, Chad and Winifred (1415); St Osmund and his Translation (1456 and 1457); the Name of Jesus (1457); the Visitation of the Blessed Virgin, the Transfiguration, St Etheldreda and St Frideswide (1480). The absence of Corpus Christi is no guarantee that a Sarum book predates the feast's promulgation by Pope Urban IV in 1264; Salisbury seems not to have adopted it until about 1317, when Pope John XXII renewed the attempt to establish it.

Salisbury service books reflect liturgical developments in other ways too. Some early manuscripts, such as GB-Mr lat.24, include the Kyrie prosula Rex virginum amator and the Gloria trope Regnum tuum solidum, which are not found in later sources. This noted missal also gives the melodic phrases of the troped Kyries twice over, once with the prosula text and once as a melisma, reflecting an early method of performance in which each phrase was sung with the words of its prosula by soloists and repeated melismatically by the choir, as in the proses attached to some Matins and processional responsories. Most graduals, for example, the manuscripts Cq Horne 16(28), Lbl 17001 and Lansdowne 462, Llp 7, Ob Hatton 3 and all four printed editions, include the offertory verses sung on ferias during Advent and from Septuagesima to Maundy Thursday, whereas some of the earliest manuscript graduals, including Lbl 12194 and Mr lat.24, omit them; still other early sources, such as EXcl 3515, have them as marginal additions. Variation may also indicate the use of a Sarum book in another diocese: an antiphoner still belonging to its original owner, the parish church of St Helen, Ranworth, Norfolk, has as an appendix the fully notated Office of its patron saint, who is not even mentioned in the Sarum calendar.

Surviving Sarum chant books naturally use fully developed staff notation. They are generally accurate, most of their melodic and textual variants occurring in traditionally ambiguous contexts. In certain respects the notation is conservative: liquescence is regularly indicated, even in the printed sources, and in the manuscripts the pes stratus occurs frequently, although the quilisma is not used. There is some confusion between the liquescent clivis and the doubling or lengthening of a note by adding a descending right-hand stem to it (a procedure perhaps suggested by the breve and long of mensural notation); this may explain the treatment of the liquescent clivis as a single note of doubled value in many polyphonic works based on monorhythmic chant cantus firmi. There is considerable variation and some family grouping between manuscripts in the choice of compound neumes for the notation of melismas. The compound neumes used in printed books appear to have been chosen partly for technical reasons; for example, the podatus on adjacent pitches is largely avoided.

Salisbury possessed a full range of chant books characteristic of the later Middle Ages. The processional may have been an addition to the original corpus; material for the processions is commonly included in early graduals and antiphoners but omitted from later copies, and the earliest extant examples of the processional itself date from the mid-14th century. The late 14th-century processional Lbl 57534 contains illustrations of the standard and special processions which may be the originals of the woodcuts found in most of the printed processionals. In view of the evident desire to keep service books up to date, it is surprising that some copies of the processional describe a route for the Palm Sunday procession that must have applied to the cathedral at Old Sarum, with its cloisters to the north of the church, not to the new cathedral at Salisbury, with its cloisters on the south. Since every church adapted the processional routes to suit its own layout, this anachronism need not have caused trouble. The Sarum tonary or tonal, in which the chant melodies are classified according to mode and melodic type, is particularly thorough and well organized.

Manuscript and printed copies of Sarum service books, and of books of Hours claiming to follow Sarum Use, survive in relatively large numbers. Printers and publishers found Sarum books so profitable that editions appeared with astonishing frequency; between 1487 and 1558 there were, for example, about 60 printings of the missal, 50 of the breviary and 250 of the Hours. The chant books were printed less often, but during the same period the processional was printed at least 25 times, the hymnal eight times and the much more voluminous gradual four times (1508, 1527, 1528 and 1532). The antiphoner was printed only once (in two parts, 1519 and 1520), but this monumental undertaking is one of the major achievements of early printing. Relatively few of these editions, and particularly few of the chant books, were printed in England. The antiphoner and all four editions of the gradual were printed in Paris, and over three-quarters of the editions of the missal and breviary were printed there or in Rouen. The processional and hymnal, however, were printed more often in Antwerp than anywhere else. The only Sarum book to be printed more often in England than abroad was the book of Hours or primer, but even here continental editions supply nearly 40% of the total.

Like virtually every other Use of medieval Europe, that of Salisbury was liturgically and musically a dialect of the Romano-Frankish lingua franca; its local feasts and liturgical peculiarities were superimposed on a foundation that was the common property of the Western Church. When new feasts were adopted at Salisbury, their texts and music were often taken from the existing Commune sanctorum (as for St David and St Chad) or imported ready-made (as for Corpus Christi). Sarum chant cannot claim any great originality; very little of it was peculiar to Salisbury, and although the Sarum versions of widely disseminated chants may show variance in pitch, underlay or degree of elaboration, the variants are insufficiently large, systematic or stable to constitute a recognizable dialect. Among the very small corpus of chant evidently unique to Salisbury is a rhymed Office Suscipe cum gaudio for the Translation of St Osmund, perhaps composed for the translation ceremony of 1457. This Office may have been confined to the cathedral itself, for it survives in a single incompletely notated manuscript, and the printed Sarum antiphoner of 1519–20 prescribes that both of Osmund's feasts should be celebrated with material from the Commune. The text of the Office mingles goliardic metre with classical hexameters, and the chant has the aimless floridity and lack of balance characteristic of late medieval examples. Even if it were possible to identify a sizable body of chant specifically composed at or for Salisbury, this would almost certainly not allow the identification of a local idiom; late medieval West European chant is simply not distinctive in this way.

Comparison of the three secular Uses whose autonomy was recognized in later medieval England – those of Salisbury, York and Hereford – does, however, reveal numerous but mainly small differences. The text of an item on a particular day may vary: for instance, in the mass for Ember Wednesday in September the three Uses have the graduals Venite filii audite me, Domine refugium factus es and Propitius est Domine respectively. Independence in the choice of sequences is common: for example, Salisbury's Mass of St Thomas of Canterbury has Solemne canticum hodie, York's has Spe mercedis et coronae and Hereford's has Mundo Christus oritur. The series of alleluias for the Sundays after Trinity also differ, as on the seventh Sunday when Salisbury's Te decet hymnus contrasts with York's Omnes gentes plaudite manibus and Hereford's Eripe me de inimicis. Similar discrepancies also occur in the Divine Office, so that, for example, at Salisbury the seventh responsory at Matins of the Epiphany is Hodie in Jordane, whereas at York it is Videntes stellam magi and at Hereford it is Illuminare illuminare Jerusalem. There are also differences in spoken items and ceremonial, such as the manner of giving the Pax within the Canon: at Salisbury the prayer Domine sancte Pater precedes the Pax, but at York and Hereford it follows it; the altar ceremonial differs, and the celebrant gives the Pax with different words. The three secular Uses also differ considerably in their repertories of Kyrie prosulas and their choice of these for particular days.

4. Polyphony. The Use of Salisbury makes little or no formal provision for polyphony, the only possible reference being a remark in the customary to the effect that on Christmas Day, the four following days and a couple of other occasions Benedicamus Domino is to be sung 'dupliciter'. It seems likely that in this context this means 'in two voices' rather than 'by two people', because it would have been obvious that Benedicamus should be performed by two singers on such important days as these. Some English Uses, for instance, that of Exeter as revised by Bishop Grandisson in the mid-14th century, make much more explicit and lavish provision for polyphony, either by prescribing which liturgical items may be performed polyphonically or by allowing polyphonic settings of non-liturgical texts to be inserted into services at specified points. Such practices were probably tacitly permitted by Salisbury too.

Despite Salisbury's reticence on the subject, English sacred polyphony of the later Middle Ages was profoundly influenced by the Sarum liturgy and its chant because, whether it was improvised or composed and notated, this polyphony was usually based upon chant melodies and designed for performance within a liturgical context. When setting liturgical texts such as items from the Lady Mass, Matins responsories, Marian antiphons, single movements from the Mass Ordinary, and pieces peculiar to days of special festivity (such as Dicant nunc Judei, the verse of the Easter processional antiphon Christus resurgens), composers habitually incorporated the chant to which the text was normally sung, either quoting it fairly literally in the middle of the texture or ornamenting it in the highest voice. Most English cyclic masses, such as Power's Alma Redemptoris mater and Tallis's 'Puer natus', have as their cantus firmus a Sarum chant presumably chosen for its referential significance. Several 15th- and early 16th-century manuscripts contain collections of polyphony showing a particularly close connection with the Sarum rite; these include Lbl 57590 (the Old Hall manuscript, connected with the House of Lancaster), Lbl Eg.3307 (perhaps from St George's Chapel, Windsor), Cmc Pepys 1236 (probably from the Almonry Chapel in Canterbury Cathedral) and Lbl 5665 (associated with Exeter and London).

NICHOLAS SANDON

Sallantin [Salantin, Sallentin], François (Alexandre) (b Paris, 13 Feb 1755; d Paris, 1830). French oboist, teacher and composer. His father was the violinist François Madelaine (1722–83) who played among the 24 Violons du Roi and at the Paris Opéra. In the 1780s François the younger performed concertos at the Concert Spirituel, including his own compositions and works by F.A. Dimmler and Antonio Rosetti. He began playing at the Opéra in 1770, and held the position of first oboist until 1812. In 1785–6 he took a year's leave, which he may have spent in London studying with the oboist J.C. Fischer. In 1802 he wrote to the administration of the Opéra complaining that he was underpaid and mentioned in particular having to arrive early to give the pitch to the first violin. His only compositions known to have been distributed are an oboe concerto (Pleyel catalogue, 1796) and two rondeaux arranged for harp. Works dedicated to him include Gustave Vogt's first oboe concerto (Paris, 1804–10) and three quartets for oboe and strings by Charles Bochsa (opp.5–7). He joined the Musique de la Garde Nationale in 1793, and also taught at the Paris Conservatoire from its establishment. Sallantin was responsible for adding two keys to the oboe to improve the intonation of c′ and f♯. These keys are explained in Vogt's Méthode (MS, *c*1816, F-Pn), and an oboe by Christophe Delusse owned by Sallantin (but since heavily modified) is preserved at the Musée de la Musique, Paris. A eulogy in the Revue musicale indicated that while he produced a very pure tone and possessed a facile technique, his style lacked elegance. By the end of his career, his reputation rested largely on being the teacher of the virtuoso Gustave Vogt.

Salle, Adrien Trudo. See SALÉ, ADRIEN TRUDO.

Sallé, Marie ['La Vestale'] (b ?1707; d Paris, 27 July 1756). French dancer and choreographer. Her father was a minor fairground player, so her early training presumably took place in the inventive atmosphere of the foires. She is said to have studied formally with Françoise Prévost and possibly also with Jean Balon of the Paris Opéra. Her first known public appearance was at Lincoln's Inn Fields Theatre, London, with her brother Francis, on 18 October 1716. During this season she was exposed to all the then-current forms of dance. Her repertory included Kellom Tomlinson's The Submission, a ballroom dance in the noble style, grotesque or comic dances such as 'The Dutch Skipper' and 'A Scene in the French Andromach Burlesqued', as well as entr'acte dances in Handel's Rinaldo. The Sallés returned to Paris for the 1717–18 season, performing in their uncle Francisque Moylin's troupe at the Foire St Laurent. The same troupe brought them back to London the following year.

Sallé's life is sparsely documented for the period 1720–25, although we do know that she sometimes performed at the French fairs. She and her brother returned to Lincoln's Inn Fields in autumn 1725, performing leading roles in Galliard's pantomime Apollo and Daphne, or The Burgomaster Trick'd and later in his The Rape of Proserpine, with The Birth of Harlequin. She returned to Paris in 1727 to perform in Mouret's Les amours des dieux at the Opéra. She and Antoine Laval also performed in J.-F. Rebel's suite Les caractères de la danse, without the customary masks, the first documented example of her infamous costume reforms. Her return to Lincoln's Inn Fields for the 1730–31 season was marked by a good royal turnout for her benefit and several performances in The Beggar's Opera. Upon returning to Paris, she signed a long-term contract with the Opéra in August 1731, but left in December 1732. A project for her to appear with the Comédie-Italienne was abandoned, as she received an order not to appear. Her most successful London season was in 1733–4, when she was able to develop two highly successful innovative dance entertainments, receiving a report in the Mercure de France (April 1734). The anonymous correspondent described the first, Pygmalion, in detail, vividly recounting the sculptor's adoring 'examin[ation] and observ[ation]' of a lovely statue's contours, upon which she comes to life and takes a dancing lesson from Pygmalion. The second entertainment, Bacchus and Ariadne, was even more daring, containing 'expressions and sentiments of the most profound sorrow, fury and humiliation', expressed by the dancer's 'steps, attitudes and gestures'; the report concluded by comparing Sallé with some famous actresses of the day.

Sallé presumably participated in all of Handel's operas at Covent Garden during the 1734–5 season. The text of Terpsicore, apparently the first danced prologue appended to a London opera seria (Il pastor fido), indicates that Sallé, as the muse of dance, was to depict various passions. Her performance as Cupid in Alcina was hissed: A.-F. Prévost D'Exiles (Le pour et le contre, Paris, 1733–40; vi, letter CCII) stated that this was because her travesty costume did not suit, but speculation has since arisen that the débâcle was engineered by a rival theatrical claque. On another occasion, Sallé's performance in Alcina received an encore.

Her reinstalment at the Paris Opéra in summer 1735 was shortly followed by her first Rameau role, as a Rose in the ballet Les fleurs, in Les Indes galantes. The livret for this work indicates she danced an interactive pas de deux with Borée; Noverre (3/1803, i, 271) recognized this scene as an early example of the ballet d'action. Rameau's music, a mixture of generic and characteristic dances, seems to reflect the different kinds of movement implied in the text. Sallé also danced in his Castor et Pollux (1737), Les fêtes d'Hébé, ou Les talents lyriques (1739) and Dardanus (1739). Her performance during the fifth entrée of André Campra's L'Europe galante (June 1736), in which various women compete for the affections of the Turkish sultan, won praise from Cahusac for her ability to express profound emotions; he considered that her contribution served to embellish the design of the poet (iii, 154–5). The music for this scene, a lengthy passacaille, demonstrates shifts of instrumental colour and dynamics that presumably provided Sallé with suitable mimic material.

Despite her early retirement in June 1740, Sallé received a pension from the king and performed occasionally at court. Her first 'retirement' role, in the anonymous L'Oracle, involved a scene in which a statue becomes animated by degrees, commencing with a sarabande and concluding with a tambourin. She is said to have had some connection with the Paris Opéra-Comique in 1743. Her last recorded performances, at Fontainebleau in 1752, were less than four years before her death.

Sallé excited considerable interest in literary and artistic circles, and her personal life was subject to much speculation. Her apparent virtue, earning her the sobriquet 'La Vestale', stimulated many poetic tributes, though there was a change in perception shortly after her final return to Paris, when rumours of possible lesbian inclinations surfaced; she is known to have had a female companion, but the nature of their relationship cannot be established. Her personal and artistic independence probably contributed to the difficulties she encountered. She was much admired for the unsurpassable grace, voluptuousness and expression of her dancing and was frequently compared with Marie-Anne Cupis de Camargo, as they were considered to epitomize two different styles of dance. An anonymous tribute in the Mercure de France (January 1732) is characteristic:

> De ta danse active et légère,
> J'admire, Camargo, le brillant caractère,
> Mais que ta rivale a d'appas!
> La grâce au sentiment unie
> Exprime en toi, Sallé, l'éloquente harmonie
> Du regard, du geste et des pas.

From observing Sallé at her house, Noverre (1807, p.103), touched by her dancing, remarked on her 'noble, expressive and spiritual' countenance. Her importance in the development of pantomime and the ballet d'action has not been fully assessed.

SARAH McCLEAVE

Sallentin, François. See SALLANTIN, FRANÇOIS.

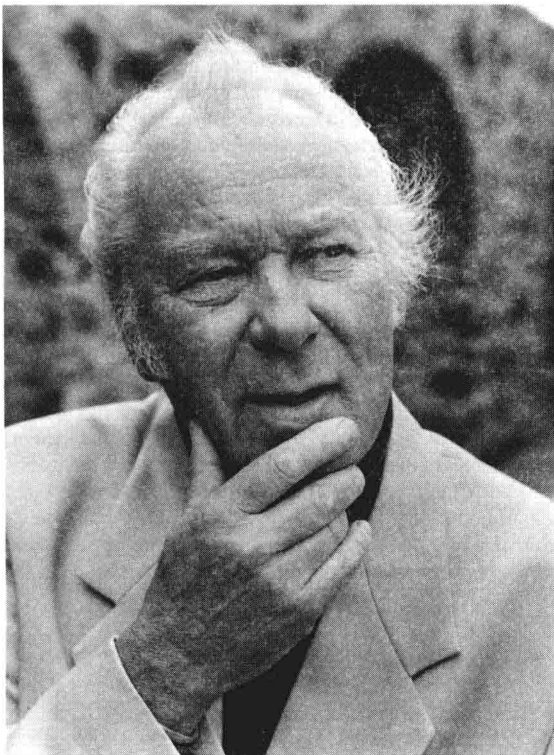
Sallinen, Aulis (b Salmi, 9 April 1935). Finnish composer. He trained first as an elementary school teacher, and then studied with Aarre Merikanto and Kokkonen at the Sibelius Academy (1955–60). He subsequently worked as manager of the Finnish RSO (1960–70), and as a teacher of composition at the Sibelius Academy (1965–76), becoming Artist Professor there in 1976. He received the Nordic Council Award in 1978 for the opera Ratsumies ('The Horseman'), and the Sibelius Prize of the Wihuri International Foundation in 1983.



Sallinen's early use of serialism extended only as far as String Quartet no.1 (1958); the Second Quartet ('Canzona') (1960), with its numerous chord repetitions, already looks ahead. The expressive melody of his youth finally burst into flower in the intensive Elegia Sebastian Knightille ('Elegy for Sebastian Knight', 1964). However, it is the orchestral Mauermusik (1962) with its microintervals, widespread harmonies built out of the interval of the 7th and clusters, which marked the culmination of his modernist period. One of the structural ideas behind this work is the passacaglia; and variation form can be found in a number of other pieces, including the 14 Juventas variations for orchestra (1963), the ballet Variations sur Mallarmé (1967) and the Third String Quartet, Aspekteja Peltoniemen Hintrikin surumarssista ('Some Aspects of Peltoniemi Hintrik's Funeral March', 1971). The examination of the same musical material from different angles is a general feature of Sallinen's work. Another important aspect – the combination of diverse musical styles – is, with the exception of Chamber Music III (1986), subtitled 'The Nocturnal Dances of Don Juanquixote', saved for the operas.

Since the early 1970s, Sallinen's music has been characterized by a strong sense of tonality, simple themes, clear forms and above all repetition, already manifest in the motifs themselves and their use. Repeated notes, recurring linear seconds and characteristic rhythmic motifs occupy a central position in his themes, while each motif is repeated many times before moving on to the next. The harmony is dominated by triads often filling out to create clusters. All these features have made Sallinen's music accessible and popular. Notable examples are to be found in the Kieliopillinen sarja (1971), Lauluja mereltä ('Songs from the Sea', 1972) for children's choir, and in some of his string works – String Quartet no.4 'Hiljaisia lauluja' ('Quiet Songs') of 1971, Chamber Music I and II (1975–6) – which at times have echoes of Finnish folk music.

Other compositions of this period – such as the Chorali for wind orchestra (1970), the one-movement Symphony no.1 (1970–71) and Symphony no.2 (1972) – are, in places, reminiscent of late Sibelius in their sparse severity; while the Cello Concerto (1976), conversely, is colourful and full of action. The Sibelian suggestions have receded into the background by the Third and Fourth Symphonies (1974–5 and 1979): marches and frequent instrumental doublings in the tutti sections point towards Shostakovich, while the thematic material is stubbornly repeated, and the form is built more out of blocks than of processes. The classic simplicity of the 1970s gives way to a fuller, more versatile mode of expression and a more personal approach to large-scale formal shapes in the 1980s. The Fifth String Quartet, Mosaikin paloja ('Pieces of Mosaic', 1983) consists of 16 mainly meditative movements, while Symphony no.5 'Washington Mosaics' (1985), outstrips its predecessor in colourfulness and the Sixth (1990) is a blatantly programmatic account of the New Zealand landscape.

Sallinen is known above all as a composer of operas. These are marked in general by a particularly passionate melos (even when compared to Puccini) manifest in the vocal lines of the female protagonists. Ratsumies ('The Horseman', 1973–4), his first opera, won the Savonlinna Opera Festival competition, and raised the genre in Finland onto a new level. The work is a ballad-like epic, set in an undefined moment some 300 to 400 years ago, and highlights Finland's position between two major powers, Sweden and Russia. In addition to power, Paavo Haavikko's libretto - a mixture of the archaic and modern - deals with the relationship between man and woman, their basic nature and destiny. Ratsumies exemplified a new type of Finnish music theatre, influenced partly by the theatre director Kalle Holmberg, which espoused credibility and honesty. However, Sallinen also tried to create a piece built out of 'symphonic frescoes', his motivic technique ensuring a uniformity that spans at least one scene at a time.

Aulis Sallinen, 1995

His next opera, Punainen viiva ('The Red Line') reveals a similar kind of 'symphonic' thinking: the meaning of its leitmotifs (e.g. the bear motif) comes more from their placement in the larger structure than from their internal content. The subject matter of the piece is a realistic account of the first Finnish general election, at a time when the population was still fighting hunger and beasts of the forest. The idiom is more tonal, melodic and unified than that of Sallinen's first opera, though the stylizations (folksong, workers' march etc.) are now broader and sharper, with whole melodies rather than phrases in folksong style for example. The work became Finnish National Opera's main touring production of the 1970s and 80s; it has since been staged in Savonlinna (1982–3), and Osnabrück and Dortmund (1985).

Kuningas lähtee Ranskaan ('The King Goes Forth to France') was commissioned jointly by the Savonlinna Opera Festival and the Royal Opera House, Covent Garden (first performed in 1984 and 1987, respectively); it has also been produced in Kiel and Santa Fe (1986). Like Ratsumies, Sallinen's third opera is an allegorical, collective drama; the large cast is held together by a narrator personified as a scribe-chronicler (the work is subtitled 'a chronicle of the coming of the new Ice Age'). The events begin in the future and proceed 600 years back in time to the Middle Ages, the Battle of Crécy and the siege of Calais. Novel features include a kind of musical sarcasm, the rapid pace of the dramatic unfolding and correspondingly lively tempos, which give the vocal writing a buffa air. By contrast the title role of Kullervo, a hero of the Kalevala, is a gloomy character whose inevitable fate darkens the whole story. Kullervo was originally commissioned for the opening of the Helsinki Opera House but it was given its première in Los Angeles in 1992. Sallinen's most recent opera, Palatsi ('The Palace', 1991–3) was another commission for the Savonlinna Opera Festival. The work is similar in spirit to The King Goes Forth to France, and deals with the coup d'état in Ethiopia and subsequent transfer of power from the splendorous tyranny of Haile Selassie to military rule. Sallinen's use of stylistic allusion here is more extensive than ever.

MIKKO HEINIÖ

Salmanov, Vadim Nikolayevich (b St Petersburg, 4 Nov 1912; d Leningrad [now St Petersburg], 27 Feb 1978). Russian composer. He began to play the piano when he was six, at first under the guidance of his father. By the age of 18 he had been prepared for entry to the conservatory but was suddenly attracted to geology, which he studied and practised before returning to music in 1935. He then began to compose and in 1936, after preparation under Arseny Gladkovsky, he entered the composition department of the Leningrad Conservatory. There he studied with Gnesin. A developing career as a composer was interrupted by military service in World War II, from which Salmanov returned in 1945 to work with enthusiasm. He produced his First Quartet, a violin sonata, a trio, a piano quartet and songs to poems of Blok and Yesenin, all containing many pages marked by impressions of the war. In the late 1940s Salmanov took up orchestral writing again, producing an important landmark in the First Symphony, in which he used Slav folk melodies. One of his most interesting works, the symphonic suite Poèticheskiye kartinki ('Poetic Pictures') on stories by Andersen, appeared in 1955; its distinctive subtlety of sonority and gentle lyricism are characteristic of Salmanov's work at this time. And the oratorio-poem Dvenadtsat' ('The Twelve'), an expansive piece in lush evocative colours, was an apotheosis of this largely illustrative style.

Subsequently Salmanov directed his attention mainly to 'pure' instrumental music, and any remaining programmatic features are conventional in character (as in the Second Symphony). It is these later works that have established Salmanov's reputation. The six quartets are models of laconic and disciplined thought, strictly linear, sharply expressive and containing a wealth of device within crystal-clear forms. The four symphonies, together with the Sonata for piano and strings (1962) and the Violin Concerto (1964), show a gravitation towards compression and an endeavour to give new meaning to sonata and symphonic form.

Vocal music also occupies an important place in Salmanov's output, and the romance genre has been a consistent enthusiasm. Here his highest achievements have been settings of García Lorca, Neruda and Rushevich, with melodic lines following speech intonation and accompaniments of richly varied harmony. Salmanov's choral works are distinguished by a subtle mastery that can achieve great effects with slender resources, as in the cycle ... No b'yotsya serdtse ('... But the Heart is Beating'). Work on choral pieces re-awakened his interest in folk melodies, and this interest found clear expression in the choral concerto Lebyodushka ('The Hen Swan'), which won a Glinka State Prize. Among his many appointments Salmanov was secretary of the RSFSR Composers' Union and a professor of composition at the Leningrad Conservatory.

HANS HEINRICH EGGEBRECHT/CHRISTIAN KADEN

Salmenhaara, Erkki (Olavi) (b Helsinki, 12 March 1941). Finnish composer and musicologist. He studied composition with Kokkonen at the Sibelius Academy in Helsinki, and in Vienna with Ligeti (1963), and musicology at the University of Helsinki, where he was awarded his doctorate in 1970. Between 1966 and 1975 he was a lecturer at the university, and became associate professor there in 1975. He has published a wealth of articles on history, aesthetics and cultural policy, and books on Ligeti, Brahms, Madetoja, Sibelius, the history of Finnish music, new music, and harmony.

Having joined the emergent avant-garde movement in the early 1960s, Salmenhaara has proceeded via experimentalism (Concerto for 2 electric violins, 1980) and web technique to a tonal motif technique. On meeting Ligeti in 1962 he began to study his music and launched the concept of Tonfeld in Finland, which in Ligeti's music covers both static timbres and 'micropolyphony', i.e. textures in which details are subordinated to the whole as statistical elements (permeability). Salmenhaara's first two symphonies are marked by melodies which, while athematic, are based on specific interval constructions. His move towards web technique beginning here is most pronounced in Elegia II (1963), in which the entire texture is determined according to its breadth, harmonic and rhythmic density, dynamics and timbre. In the Third Symphony (1963, rev. 1964) Ligetian webs are restricted to the finale; in other respects the tragi-expressive polyphony is reminiscent of Kokkonen's dodecaphony.

A stylistic turning-point came with Le bateau ivre (1965, revised 1966), inspired by Rimbaud. Its timbres, now associated more with the mixtures of Impressionism than Ligeti, are melodically and harmonically constructed from triads (e.g. juxtaposed C minor, D♭ major and B minor chords). Salmenhaara described his next work, Suomi-Finland, as 'neotonal', and as well as the use of ironic-nostalgic quotations (La fille en mini-jupe, 1967) the basic features of his work became diatonic melody, triads, bitonality, sequences, a clear pulse and an overall repetitiveness. The small, recurring motifs characteristic of web technique were not superimposed, but became in a way consecutive, in a manner reminiscent of minimalism. His main works in this new style include the opera Portugalin nainen ('The Portuguese Woman', 1972). Later in the 1970s Salmenhaara's music became even more concentrated: tonal entities were no longer limited to constantly transposing combinations of a few chords (Fourth Symphony); on the contrary, tonality became so established that key signatures reappeared. The presence of tradition and sense of nostalgia are particularly marked in the First String Quartet (1977) with its echoes of Mendelssohn, and the Cello Concerto (1983–7), which alludes to Franck. The soft harmony of Salmenhaara's music, combined with a steady crotchet beat (as in the Fifth Symphony, 1989), creates a mood that is dream-like and lyrically surrealistic.

MIKKO HEINIÖ

Salmhofer, Franz (b Vienna, 22 Jan 1900; d Vienna, 22 Sept 1975). Austrian composer and conductor. He studied the clarinet, composition and musicology in Vienna. A pupil of Franz Schreker and Franz Schmidt, he was musical director and composer at Vienna's Burgtheater for many years and subsequently director of the Staatsoper and the Volksoper (1945–63). With a conception of music that took Romanticism as its starting point, he was regarded by many at the end of the 1920s as progressive, but not to an extent that would have endangered performances of his works in the 1930s and 40s or that would have forced him to emigrate. Among the most widely performed of contemporary composers, he became known primarily through his operas; Iwan Tarassenko (1938) demonstrates the humanistic ideals of the 'good man', and both the ballet Österreichische Bauernhochzeit (1933) and the opera Das Werbekleid (1943) feature folk elements. His honours include the Austrian State Prize (1937) and the prize of the City of Vienna (1960).

He sang Ivan Susanin at Wexford (1973), then made his Covent Garden début (1974) as Fasolt and his Bayreuth début (1976) as Hunding, returning as Daland, the Landgrave, Titurel and King Mark. He made his Metropolitan début (1981) as King Mark, and has subsequently appeared there as Sarastro, Rocco, Hagen, Osmin, Daland and Hunding. His repertory also includes Seneca (L'incoronazione di Poppea), the Commendatore, Caspar (Der Freischütz), Gremin and many Verdi roles. His magnificently resonant voice, huge stature and dramatic flair are particularly effective in the title role of Boris Godunov, which he first sang in 1984 at Zürich and has repeated at Barcelona (1986) and other theatres, and as Ivan Khovansky (Khovanshchina), which he first sang in Hamburg in 1994. Salminen has recorded many of his Wagner roles (including a noble, eloquent King Mark under Barenboim), in addition to Seneca, Osmin, the Commendatore, Sarastro, Caspar and the leading bass roles in Sallinen's The Horseman and Kullervo.

ELIZABETH FORBES

Salminger [Salbinger, Salblinger], Sigmund (b Munich, *c*1500; d Augsburg, ?1562/3). German Reform leader, teacher and music editor. Originally a Franciscan friar in Munich, Salminger left the order under the influence of the Reformation, married Anna Hallerin and in 1526 moved to Augsburg. There, both he and his wife joined the Anabaptist movement and were baptized by Hans Hutt in March 1527. Soon afterwards Salminger was chosen by lot to lead the Augsburg group. Imprisoned in September 1527 for his religious beliefs, he remained in gaol throughout the following years of persecution; finally he renounced his ties with the Anabaptist sect in a public confession dated 17 December 1530. After his release he was ordered to leave the city in March 1531, but he petitioned to remain because of ill-health and penury. His activities during the next few years are not known, but by 1537 he had apparently achieved full reinstatement in Augsburg, where he was allowed to teach and even enjoyed the patronage of the powerful FUGGER family. On 4 October 1539 he was granted an imperial copyright for his forthcoming publications.

Salminger's importance in the field of music stems less from his authorship of several hymns and of a treatise on music than from his activities as editor for the printers MELCHIOR KRIESSTEIN and PHILIPP ULHART. His publications include the first complete German psalter with melodies and four collections of motets, important for their many unica and first editions of works by leading German and Netherlandish composers, both for the Reformed and for Catholic use.

Salmo (Sp.). See under TAMBOURIN DE BÉARN.

Salmon [née Munday], Eliza (b Oxford, 1787; d Chelsea, 5 June 1849). English soprano. Her mother was a member of a leading musical family, the Mahons. A pupil of John Ashley, she made her Covent Garden début in the Lenten Oratorios on 4 March 1803. Gifted with a beautiful voice, a charming manner and a face 'of dazzling fairness', she had immediate success; but her attempts to embellish her solo singing were criticized. In 1806 she married James Salmon, organist of St Peter's, Liverpool, but she continued to appear from time to time in London and at the Three Choirs Festival, finding great popularity. In 1823 her husband, in financial difficulties, joined the army and was posted to the West Indies, where he died. Mrs Salmon remained in constant demand, and her professional income in 1823 is said to have reached £5000. But in 1825 she was frequently ill and during the Concerts of Ancient Music in March 1825 her voice collapsed. She never resumed public appearances, and was unable to find pupils. She remarried, but was destitute in her last years.

Mrs Salmon was a high soprano (she could sing f''' with ease) and had great vocal agility. Her tone was likened by some to the glass harmonica, by others to the clarinet, and her style was compared with the florid manner of Catalani.

Salmon, Jacques (b Picardy, *c*1545; fl 1571–86). French composer and singer. In 1571 he served among the chamber musicians of François, Duke of Anjou, as a singer. Between 1575 and 1584 he was described variously as 'taille', 'haut-contre' and 'valet de chambre' in the chamber accounts of Henri III, the duke's brother. His chanson Je meurs pensant en ta douceur (now lost) won the silver lute prize at the St Cecilia competition at Evreux in 1575. He collaborated with Beaulieu in providing music for Beaujoyeux's Balet comique de la Royne (Paris, 1582/R; ed. in MSD, xxv, 1971) and in organizing its performance for the wedding of the Duke of Joyeuse on 15 October 1581. A 'Salmon' was listed as a member of the Congrégation de l'Oratoire de Notre-Dame de Vie Saine, established by Henri III at Vincennes in 1584; the statutes required two musicians as 'confrères'. Nothing is known of him after January 1586 when he rented a room at the Ste Chapelle for four months; he may have retired to a canonry he held at St Vulfran in Abbeville. Two of his airs (Baisez o déesses and O beau laurier) were printed by Le Roy & Ballard (RISM 1583[9]). Both are divided into two sections, for four and five voices respectively, using the same melodies as those harmonized by other contemporary composers (Guillaume Tessier, 1582, and Pierre Bonnet, 1585), with the free declamatory rhythm of the new air de cour. O beau laurier also appeared in an arrangement for voice and lute by Gabriel Bataille in 1608 (1608[10]; ed. A. Verchaly, Airs de cour pour voix et luth, Paris, 1961), and was reprinted with a sacred text (O Jesus nom doux) at Valenciennes in 1619.

FRANK DOBBINS

Salmon, Thomas (b Hackney, London, 24 June 1648; d Mepsal [now Meppershall], Beds., bur. 16 Aug 1706). English clergyman, music theorist and amateur musician. He entered Trinity College, Oxford, as a commoner on 8 April 1664, mainly to study mathematics. After graduating MA he became rector of Mepsal, a position he held for the rest of his life. He was a fellow of the Royal Society. Matthew Locke referred him to John Birchensha for music lessons.

Salmon was 24 when his Essay to the Advancement of Musick appeared. In it he proposed certain changes in notation that he thought would make music more readily understood by doing away with obsolete complexities. Simple letter names would replace names of notes deriving from the hexachordal system; instead of the multiplicity of clefs then in use a four-line staff would be employed, its bottom line always representing G and its pitch level shown by a prefixed symbol: B (bass), M (mean) or T (treble); lute and other tablatures would be replaced by the new staff notation, and any system of variable tuning (viol tunings, for example) would be replaced by a simpler and constant one.

The Essay initiated the most celebrated musical pamphlet war of the 17th century. Locke defended traditional systems in his Observations upon a Late Book of 1672. Salmon countered this with his Vindication, which in 1673 elicited Locke's Present Practice of Musick Vindicated. The dispute was conducted with unbridled abuse and even obscenity, particularly by Locke, but this was typical of the polemics of the time and has been unduly emphasized (see illustration). Locke, who was joined by John Playford and Milton's nephew John Phillips, objected to the proposals because they offered a less precise means of naming notes and did not, with the three prefixes, reduce the clefs or their equivalents but rather made frequent changes of prefix necessary, particularly with a four-line staff. He considered tablature more suitable for complex lute writing, and he censured the reduction in viol tunings since it would greatly restrict the playing of chords.

Certain aspects of notation did change along the lines that Salmon proposed (though he was hardly responsible for the abandonment of hexachordal names, which were falling into disuse anyway). It has been argued that Playford, the most moderate of the disputants, to some extent adopted one of Salmon's principles when he used

However, having timely apprehenſions of his coming, I was not out of all hopes to eſcape, did there not go before him a terrible fellow in Buff, an Epigrammatical Poetaſter; this man, Sir, (one would think) dealt only with Pen, Ink, and Paper; but alas! he was arm'd with all the Inſtruments of Cruelty; and heated with ſuch an implacable Malice, that he ſentences me; firſt, To have my Hide taw'd till it was tender; then to have the foreſaid intimate Garment, my Skin, to be fley'd off whilſt I yet remain'd alive: nay further, could he have got a Rime for defunct (which it ſeems was the word he deſigned) I muſt alſo have been eaten alive with Pepper and Salt, three days after I had been defunct.

the treble clef for both soprano and tenor parts in choral music; this became a distinctive feature of subsequent English notation of vocal music and by the use of super- or subscript octave signs attached to a clef was further rationalized and extended to instrumental notation in the 20th century.

The controversy was much discussed. Salmon's proposals were supported by Anthony Wood, John Wallis, Alexander Malcolm and Burney; the Royal Society recommended their adoption; and the theorist J.F. de la Fond (fl 1716–25) reiterated them without acknowledgment in 1725. They were opposed by Roger North (Musicall Gramarian of *c*1726, GB-Lbl Add.32533, ff.44*v*–46*v*) and Hawkins.

Salmon's later work on temperament stemmed from his interest in mathematical acoustics and contributed valuably to investigations made at the time by Wallis and other members of the Royal Society. It was by no means purely theoretical, however: Salmon persuaded the viol players Frederick and Christian Steffkin to fret their instruments so as to produce just intonation by following his mathematical principles. He also became interested in the problem of elucidating ancient Greek enharmonic music but had no time to conduct researches before he died.

MICHAEL TILMOUTH

Salmond, Felix (Adrian Norman) (b London, 19 Nov 1888; d New York, 19 Feb 1952). English cellist. The son of the singer Norman Salmond, he studied with Whitehouse at the RCM (1905–9), also taking private lessons with Edouard Jacobs in Brussels. He made his début in October 1909, at the Bechstein Hall, accompanied by his mother, a former pupil of Clara Schumann. For several years he toured Britain, giving solo recitals and appearing with the Queen's Hall, London Symphony, Hallé and Royal Albert Hall orchestras. He also toured the USA in a piano quartet with Bauer, Huberman and Tertis. On 21 May 1919 he played at the Wigmore Hall in the public premières of Elgar's Quartet in E minor and Piano Quintet in A minor in an ensemble led by Albert Sammons. On 27 October that year Salmond gave the première of Elgar's Cello Concerto at the Queen's Hall, with the LSO conducted by the composer; its poor reception was largely due not to the soloist but to inadequate rehearsal time. Between 1919 and 1921 Salmond was cellist of the Chamber Music Players, but in 1922 he returned to the USA, making his solo début at the Aeolian Hall, New York, on 29 March; he settled there and made many tours of North America. He visited England several times (last in 1947) and also toured in Europe in 1930. In 1937 he formed the Trio of New York. He earned great appreciation in America, not only as a fine musician and technician but also as a teacher; he was appointed to the Juilliard Graduate School on its inception in 1924, and was head of the cello department of the Curtis Institute, Philadelphia, from 1925 until 1942. His many notable pupils included Orlando Cole, Bernard Greenhouse, Leonard Rose and Daniel Saidenberg. Salmond's repertory showed catholic taste and included works by such contemporary composers as Barber, Bloch and Bridge; he also gave the premières of two compositions by Enescu.

LYNDA MACGREGOR

Salò, Gasparo da. See GASPARO DA SALÒ.

Salomo, Elias [Salomon, Hélie] (fl 2nd half of the 13th century). French theorist. In 1274 he was awarded a canonry in the village of Saint-Astier (diocese of Périgueux) by Pope Gregory X (1271–6). This appointment resulted from a request made to the pope in Salomo's sole surviving work, the *Scientia artis music*e, written in the same year. An inscription in the treatise implies that the author had some connections with the papal court, then in residence at Lyons for a church council. Only a single manuscript of the treatise survives (I-Ma D.75.inf.). It was forgotten until published in GerbertS, iii (1784), 16–64.

The Scientia artis musice consists of 31 chapters covering the fundamentals of chant theory and practice. After lamenting the sorry state of church music, the author takes up such traditional topics as the letter names of the notes and their hexachord syllables, the system of claves, the musical hand, the eight modes, staff notation, falsa musica (to which he attached a wide range of meanings), and the genres of chant. The treatise also incorporates a tonary with illustrations of the lesson tones (chaps. 11–27). Among the unique features of the treatise is an exposition of strict parallel organum in four voices with practical instructions about how the organum should be rehearsed.

The Scientia artis musice stands somewhat apart from the medieval theoretical literature, for it does not obviously borrow from earlier theorists. The treatise is filled with digressions that give evidence both of Salomo's personal manner of teaching and of the qualities that a practical, if somewhat conservative, musician of the 13th century found desirable in performance. Curiously, the treatise has attracted most attention because of a supposed reference to polyphony in parallel seconds practised among the Lombards, though Salomo makes no unambiguous reference to this peculiar custom.

JOSEPH DYER

Salomon, Johann Peter (b Bonn, bap. 20 Feb 1745; d London, 28 Nov 1815). German violinist, impresario and composer, later resident in England. He was the second son of Philipp Salomon, a member of the oboe band and subsequently a court musician in Bonn. On 30 August 1758, at the age of only 13, he was appointed to a salaried position as a musician at the Bonn court. In 1761 or 1762 he went on tour, at first retaining his salary since his father deputized for him. Salomon was probably trying to gain a footing in Dresden, which at that time was the seat of government of Saxony and Poland. By summer 1764 he was at Rheinsberg as musical director to Prince Heinrich of Prussia. At the prince's second household in Berlin Salomon met C.P.E. Bach, and through him became familiar with J.S. Bach's solo violin sonatas and partitas, which he is said to have still performed in exemplary fashion during his years in London. He left Rheinsberg probably in 1780 and went via Paris to London, where he made his first public appearance at Covent Garden on 23 March 1781. Apart from journeys on the Continent, including repeated visits to Bonn, he remained in England for the rest of his life.

Salomon played a leading part in English musical life, not only in London but in the provinces as well. Having made his name as a brilliant violinist, he made progressively fewer solo appearances and turned his attention to conducting and especially promoting concerts. He mounted subscription concerts from 1783, featuring such international artists as the soprano Mme Mara, and his greatest triumph was to secure Haydn's visits to London in 1790–91 and 1794–5, for which the two sets of six 'Salomon' or 'London' symphonies (H I:93–104) were written. Haydn's esteem for his impresario and orchestral leader can sometimes be seen in the symphonies (for example, the phrase marked 'Salomon solo ma piano' in the trio of no.97, and the florid violin part of no.103, second movement); the Concertante in B♭ (H I:105) was composed for Salomon, who played the solo violin part; and the six string quartets opp.71 and 74 (H III:69–74), written between the two London visits in 1793, though dedicated to Count Apponyi, were clearly designed for the public performances that Salomon's quartet gave in London. Salomon is also said to have had a hand in providing Haydn with the original model for the text of The Creation. He was one of the founder-members of the Philharmonic Society and led the orchestra at its first concert on 8 March 1813. He died as a result of a riding accident and was buried in the cloisters of Westminster Abbey.

On 28 February 1816 Beethoven, who had had business dealings with Salomon, wrote to Ferdinand Ries: 'I am greatly distressed at the death of Salomon, for he was a noble-minded man whom I well remember since my childhood'. And Rochlitz in his obituary in the Allgemeine musikalische Zeitung remarked: 'Among all purely executant musicians of this age none has had so wide, so decisive and so beneficent an influence as he'. Rochlitz's tribute is a qualification of Salomon's merits as well as an appreciation, however, for it explicitly takes no account of his compositions. As the author of a substantial number of works he is virtually forgotten despite his gift for imaginative and attractive tunes, perhaps because of his limited ability in developing his material.

HUBERT UNVERRICHT

Salomon, Joseph-François (b Toulon, bap. 3 April 1649; d Versailles, 5 March 1732). French composer and organist. According to La Borde he was a master of the viol and a pupil of Sainte-Colombe. He received his early musical training at the metropolitan church of St Sauveur in Aix-en-Provence, where he was a chorister from 1657 and later sub-deacon (1666) and organist (1669) when G. Poitevin was maître de chapelle. He abandoned his ecclesiastical career in 1671 and left Aix-en-Provence. From 1679 he was at court in Versailles as harpsichordist and organist to Queen Marie Thérèse and viol player in the king's chamber music from 1713 (perhaps from 1706) until 1720 or 1727. In 1683 he entered the competition held by Louis XIV to replace Du Mont and Robert as sous-maître de chapelle of the royal chapel and got through to the second round. His operas, Medée et Jason and Théonoé, are in the tradition of Lully and Campra, while his published motets show the influence of Bernier's Italianate style.

A Salomon was maître de chapelle of Cahors Cathedral in 1750; a Magnificat and a motet by him survive (F-Pn), and he may also be the composer of a De profundis and an In te Domine speravi (F-LYm) usually ascribed to Joseph-François.

Salomon [Shalmon], Karl [Kar'el] (b Heidelberg, 13 Nov 1897; d Jerusalem, 15 Jan 1974). Israeli composer, conductor, singer and keyboard player of German birth.

He studied the organ with Philipp Wofrum and composition with Richard Strauss. From 1920 to 1926 he held the position of conductor at the Hamburg Neues Stadt-Theater, and from 1931 to 1932 was baritone and stage director at the Deutsche Musikbühne. He emigrated to Palestine in 1933, where he was appointed programme director of the newly founded Palestine Broadcasting Service (PBS, later Kol Israel ['The Voice of Israel']), a position he held until his retirement in 1962; he founded the PBS Orchestra (later the Kol Israel Orchestra) in 1938.

Many of Salomon's early works were destroyed. His music from 1933 is tonal with modal inflections, combining European traditions with folk influences to create a light, accessible style. The Sepharadic Suite (1961) incorporates Spanish melodies; popular material is also used in the Second Symphony 'Leilot be'Cna'an ('Nights of Canaan', 1949). The second slow movement of the Glockenspiel Concerto is based on the signature tune of Kol Israel. In the 1950s Salomon concentrated on writing vocal works, among them the biblical cantata Kibbutz ha'galuyot ('Gathering of Exiles', 1952). His most performed work, Symphonic Suite on Greek Themes (1943), received the 1951 Engel prize.

Salomon Quartet. British string quartet. It was founded in 1982 by Simon Standage, with Micaela Comberti, second violin, Trevor Jones, viola, and Jennifer Ward Clarke, cello, all of whom have played in such period-instrument orchestras as the English Concert (which Standage led for many years), the London Classical Players and Standage's own group, Collegium Musicum 90. Through its concert appearances in Britain and Europe, and its many recordings for Hyperion, the Salomon has established itself as Britain's leading period-instrument string quartet, its performances distinguished by their cleanness of tone and attack and freshness of response. Its recordings include all the mature Mozart quartets and quintets and an acclaimed Haydn quartet series, in addition to quartets by Gyrowetz and a disc devoted to 18th-century English string quartets. Standage and Comberti play on copies of Stradivari instruments by David Rubio, Jones on a copy of a Stradivari viola by Rowland Ross, and Ward Clarke on a Forster cello of 1791.

Salonen, Esa-Pekka (b Helsinki, 30 June 1958). Finnish conductor and composer. He entered the Sibelius Academy as a horn student of Fransman in 1973, graduating in 1977. That year he founded the avant-garde Ears Open collective, together with Kaipainen, Lindberg and Saariaho. He was also a founder member of the experimental Toimii! ensemble. Private study in composition with Rautavaara and conducting with Jorma Panula followed. He then attended conducting courses in Siena and Darmstadt, and made his professional début in 1979 with the Finnish RSO. His success prompted engagements across Scandinavia, including a remarkable production of Wozzeck at the Swedish Royal Opera. In September 1983 he appeared at short notice in Mahler's Symphony no.3 with the Philharmonia Orchestra in London, and gained immediate acclaim; this led to his appointment as conductor of the Swedish RSO in 1985, a post he held until 1994. He was principal guest conductor of the Oslo PO from 1984, and of the Philharmonia from 1985 to 1995. Salonen has also been involved with the New Stockholm Chamber Orchestra, Avanti! Chamber Orchestra and London Sinfonietta. In 1984 he made his American début with the Los Angeles PO; in 1992 he became its music director, and in the same year began a collaboration with Peter Sellars, leading to celebrated productions of works by Messiaen, Hindemith, Debussy and Stravinsky. His programming in Los Angeles has not been without controversy, providing a context for new works by juxtaposing them with acknowledged masterpieces of the early 20th century. Salonen's conducting combines expressive phrasing, clarity of texture and a strong sense of form. His recordings range from Haydn symphonies through works by Berwald, Nielsen and Sibelius to music by Stravinsky, Messiaen, Lutosławski and Saariaho.

Though few in number, Salonen's works are of unmistakable originality. His musical language developed rapidly from a freely tonal neo-romanticism to a multi-faceted modernist language influenced by elements of American minimalism as well as by Stravinsky, Messiaen, Berio and Donatoni. An early interest in instrumental virtuosity yielded the Yta series of solo instrumental pieces: other works of that decade, such as the Saxophone Concerto, the radiophonic composition Baalal and the spectacular showpiece Floof (a prizewinner at the 1992 UNESCO International Rostrum of Composers) demonstrate humour verging at times on the absurd. In the 1990s Salonen turned to the orchestra: works such as Mimo II (a reworking of Second Meeting), LA Variations and the later version of Giro are genuinely orchestral in conception, characterized by strength of form and an original world of harmony and timbre.

Salonen, Sulo (Nikolai) (b Pyhtää, 27 Jan 1899; d Pernaja, 21 May 1976). Finnish composer. He studied the violin and the organ at the Helsinki Church Music Institute, graduating in 1929, and composition at the Helsinki Music Institute (1917–22, 1926–9). Thereafter he was singing master at the lyceum and organist in Jacobstad (now Pietarsaari) (1929–48) and then organist in Sibbo (now Sipoo) (1952–64). His strictly polyphonic music is almost exclusively for the church. One of the best works is the Missa a cappella, the first complete mass setting made in Finland and a piece that has been compared with the work of Distler, Pepping and Heiller. The Requiem successfully suits both concert and liturgy; although the music occasionally approaches Stravinsky or Orff, Salonen's individuality dominates.

Salpinx. A trumpet-like instrument of the ancient Greeks (classified as an AEROPHONE). It consists of a straight bronze tube of small diameter, shorter than the Roman tuba (see TUBA (ii)), with a bone mouthpiece and ending in a bell whose shape was variable. It was altogether less frequently encountered in Greek musical life than was the tuba in Etruscan and Roman musical life: it was mentioned only twice by Homer and did not become at all common in Greek literature and art until the classical period. It was then depicted on a number of vases, usually being played by a soldier. In some cases the PHORBEIA, a mouthband often employed by AULOS players, was represented (see illustration). The 5th-century tragedians described the salpinx as tyrrhenos ('Etruscan') on several occasions. Bronze instruments were certainly important among the Etruscans, but these references cannot be taken as proof of the Etruscan origins of the instrument, since there are scattered references to it before the Greeks had contact with the Etruscans. The 5th-century authors also associated it with war, where its piercing sound made it an ideal signalling device; the same quality enabled it to perform a variety of functions such as summoning a large crowd or beginning a chariot race.

JAMES W. MCKINNON

Salsa. Urban popular dance genre developed in New York City and Puerto Rico during the 1960s and 70s, based on Cuban dance styles and incorporating Puerto Rican elements and influences from jazz and rock. The term 'salsa' literally means 'sauce', the culinary metaphor of a spicy concoction mirroring the music's hybrid origins and infectious appeal.

In general stylistic terms, salsa closely resembles its Cuban antecedents, fusing West African rhythmic and textural principles with Iberian melodic and harmonic structures. Most salsa compositions derive from the Cuban son and related forms such as the upbeat guaracha. Songs are based on a two-part formal structure, with verses sung by lead vocalist, followed by a call-and-response section known as the montuno. The montuno section features driving rhythms, solo improvisation and punchy brass choruses known as mambos. A salsa ensemble typically includes vocals, Cuban percussion, piano, bass, trumpets, trombones and saxophone, and usually ranges in size from ten to 14 members. The percussion instruments include small two-headed bongos and the long, cylindrical single-headed tumbadoras, more commonly known outside of Cuba as conga drums. Other important percussion instruments include timbales, a pair of toms mounted on a stand with accompanying cymbal, cowbells and woodblock; claves, two wooden sticks struck together; maracas (rattles); and güiro, a notched scraper of Amerindian origin.

The distinctive feel of salsa is based upon a foundation of interlocking rhythmic ostinati. These rhythms, and also the brass 'punches' and syllabic accents in the lyrics, are governed by a two-measure timeline known as the clave, which can be felt as either a 3+2 or 2+3 pattern. Each rhythm instrument has its own part, known as tumbao in the conga drums, martillo in the bongos, cascará on the timbales and montuno on the piano. The bass line is also notable for its 'anticipated bass' pattern, which emphasizes off-beats rather than the downbeat stress typical of other Latin American and Caribbean popular styles. The piano montuno is usually doubled at the octave in the left hand, but pianists can also use chord inversions in the left hand to enrich the harmonic texture (ex.1), a technique that became widespread during the 1990s. Most salsa tunes feature simple four- or eight-bar harmonic progressions (e.g., I–V–V–I or I–IV–V–I or VI–II–V–I); the excerpt in ex.1 has been condensed in order to show typical chord movement over salsa rhythmic patterns.

Given that its proponents in New York City were largely Puerto Rican migrants, it is not surprising that salsa became an emblem of Puerto Rican cultural identity in the 1970s, for both islanders and those living in the United States. Despite the oft-repeated claim that salsa is just 'Cuban music', New York and Puerto Rican salsa differs from its Cuban antecedents in several ways: the style of playing is more strident, with prominent use of trombones; Afro-Puerto Rican rhythms such as bomba are used (e.g. for contrast during instrumental interludes); the Puerto Rican cuatro (a small ten-stringed lute, shaped like a violin) is incorporated in the ensemble; there is a strong use of jazz harmonies and solo improvisation; and references are made in the lyrics to life in Puerto Rico and in particular to the harsh experiences of the New York Latino barrio. Important salsa innovators and performers include Eddie Palmieri, Ray Barretto, Willie Colón, Ruben Blades, Johnny Pacheco, Celia Cruz, Tito Puente, Mongo Santamaría, Louie Ramírez and Larry Harlow.

During the 1960s and 70s, salsa spread to other parts of Latin America, especially urban centres in Venezuela, Colombia and Panama. Venezuelan and Colombian salsa bands have also made their mark on the international scene. In the late 1980s and 90s, a new style called salsa romanticá (fusing the pop balada with salsa rhythms) helped expand salsa's appeal to Latin American middle-class and upper middle-class audiences. Salsa's popularity in America has been superseded in some sectors by the Dominican merengue, but it remains one of the most prominent styles in Latin America and the Caribbean. It is firmly entrenched as a significant transnational musical genre, commanding large audiences throughout the Americas, Europe and Japan.

Saltando (It.). See SAUTILLÉ.

Saltarello (It. 'little hop'; Fr. pas de Brabant; Ger. Hoppertanz, Hupfertanz; Sp. alta, alta danza). A generic term for moderately rapid Italian dances, usually in triple metre and involving jumping movements.

The earliest known use of the term saltarello occurs in a Tuscan manuscript from the late 14th or early 15th century (GB-Lbl Add.29987, facs. in MSD, xiii, 1965), in which 15 textless monophonic pieces are included under the general heading 'Istampitta'. The last seven items of the group include four pieces labelled 'saltarello', along with a 'trotto' and the comparatively well-known dances La Manfredina and Lamento di Tristano. Like the estampies that precede them (see ESTAMPIE), the saltarellos consist of several repeated strains, each with a first and second ending (marked 'aperto' and 'chiuso' in the manuscript). Intriguingly the saltarellos do not share a common metre: two may be transcribed in 6/8 (ex.1), one in 3/4, and one in 4/4, leading Sachs (Eine Weltgeschichte des Tanzes, 1933; Eng. trans., 1937/R) to conclude that only the first three were true saltarellos, the last being assumed an example of the 15th-century duple-metre quarternaria, sometimes called 'saltarello tedesco'. His conclusion suggests a link between these four dances and the court dances of the 15th and 16th centuries that, however, has yet to be proved; as no choreographies from before the 1430s are known to survive, there is little evidence that these dances had anything in common with later saltarellos.

In the 15th century the name 'saltarello' was applied to one of the dances of the bassadanza family (see BASSE DANSE), the most serious and elegant of contemporary Italian court dances. A number of Italian dancing-masters, including Domenico da Piacenza, Antonio Cornazano and Guglielmo Ebreo, described a method of deriving four progressively faster and more athletic dances from a single bassadanza cantus firmus; generally, the cantus firmus was written in either black breves or white semibreves, which had no mensural significance, and the musicians accompanying the dance were to 'rhythm' them according to the kind of dance required. For the bassadanza itself each cantus firmus note would be a perfect long, for the quarternaria or saltarello tedesco each would be an imperfect long, for the saltarello each would be a perfect breve, and for the PIVA each would be an imperfect breve. Ex.2 shows the application of these successive rhythms to the popular basse danse tune La Spagna. It is thought that accompanying musicians improvised two or more parts around the bassadanza tenor, but no corroborating sets of polyphonic 'rhythmed' bassadanzas are known to survive.

Little is known about the actual movements of the 15th-century saltarello. Saltarello movements were included in many 15th-century balli (see BALLO) as well as in the bassadanza itself, however, and it is from the extant choreographies for these pantomimic theatrical dances that our knowledge of them comes. Domenico da Piacenza's ballo choreography 'Verçepe' (*c*1420), for example, includes a series of saltarello steps at the beginning and end, as well as interspersed elsewhere in the main part of the dance (ex.3).

As early as 1465 Cornazano had explained the mensural relationships of the bassadanza in reverse, using the saltarello as his point of reference; by the early 16th century, in fact, both extremes of the family had fallen into disuse, so that the most common dance group was some variant of the inner quarternaria–saltarello pair (see NACHTANZ). Although some saltarellos appeared as independent pieces in the growing number of instrumental music collections printed in the 16th century, most surviving examples are afterdances to paduane, as in Joan Ambrosio Dalza's Intabulatura de lauto of 1508 (see PAVAN) or passamezzos (see PASSAMEZZO). As afterdances saltarellos usually derived both melodic and harmonic material from their duple-metre partners, depending on them to such an extent that a musical saltarello was often little more than a metrical transformation of its pavan or passamezzo; the resulting dance had regular four-bar phrases and a clear sense of harmonic direction. An important characteristic of the 16th-century saltarello was an ambiguity of metre such that a piece often seems in transcription to alternate between 6/8 and 3/4. Ex.4 shows the beginnings of a passamezzo and its saltarello. Performers should take care to note that all 16th-century saltarellos were intended to be played in triple metre, although many seem to be in duple in the original prints because of the use of tactus barring and a mensuration of ¢ (see Heartz's preface to CEKM, viii, 1965).

Numerous choreographies exist for late 16th-century saltarellos by Italian dancing masters such as Fabritio Caroso (Il ballarino, 1581/R; Nobiltà di dame, 1600/R, 2/1605) and Cesare Negri (Le gratie d'amore, 1602/R, 2/1604 as Nuove inventione di balli). As Sutton (1986) points out, no identifiable step pattern has emerged, and there is no 'tempo di saltarello'. Rather, certain steps suited to the two-bar units of fast triple meter are found frequently, such as 'breve Reverences', 'broken sequences', 'falling jumps', 'reprises with foot under', 'Sapphic steps', 'paired minim steps' (each to a triple beat or battuta tripla) and 'knots' (Sutton, pp.43–4). Some contemporary writers described the saltarello as a faster version of the Italian GALLIARD (Thoinot Arbeau, Orchésographie, 1588, 2/1589/R) and Thomas Morley (A Plaine and Easie Introduction to Practicall Musicke, 1957/R). It could be that at some places this was true, though saltarello choreographies by Caroso, Negri and others do not bear much resemblance to the danced galliard with its five-step 'tempi di gagliarda' patterns, alternating variations and walking passages. Both galliards and saltarellos often appeared as an 'afterdance' in which the dance music is a proportionally faster rendition of a previous piece, and frequently a saltarello will follow a galliard in the balletto suites of Caroso and Negri. (See also CINQUE PAS.)

The courtly saltarello waned in popularity in the 17th century, although some stylized versions have survived, such as Peter Philips's variation 'in saltarello' included among the ten divisions of the Galiarda passamezzo in the Fitzwilliam Virginal Book and Giovanni Picchi's saltarellos in Intavolatura di balli d'arpicordo (Venice, 2/1621/R). In 1703, Brossard (Dictionnaire de musique) described it as 'a kind of movement that is always jumping, which is almost always made in triple metre with a dotted note at the beginning of every bar'. He went on to say that the FORLANA, the SICILIANA and the English jig (see GIGUE (i)) were often said to be written 'in saltarello', apparently because of the prevalence of dotted patterns in their characteristic rhythms.

Three choreographies in 6/4 meter are extant in the Beauchamps-Feuillet notation, and may be derived from the saltarello tradition. They are: 'The Saltarella', a couple dance 'made for Her Majesty's Birthday 1708' by Isaac, set to music by James Paisible (Little and Marsh, no.7580); 'La Saltarelle', a ball dance by L.-G. Pécour set to music from André Campra's Aréthuse (1701) and Télémaque (1704); and 'La Saltarelle Nouvelle', also a ball dance by Pécour, set to forlana music from Campra's Les fêtes vénitiennes (1710).

Towards the end of the 18th century, a popular folk-dance called the saltarello began to gain favour, first in Rome, then in the Italian regions of Ciociara (part of Latium), Romagna, Abruzzi and the Marches. This dance in 3/4 or 6/8 was generally danced alone or by one couple, and consisted of increasingly rapid hopping steps around an imaginary semicircle, accompanied by 'violent' arm movements; musical accompaniment was provided by guitars, tambourines, and often by the singing of onlookers (see 'Saltarello', ES). The two saltarellos included by Mendelssohn in the last movement in his Italian Symphony were probably based on tunes for the 19th-century folkdance, as were the saltarellos included in J. Perrot's ballet Catarina ou La fille du bandit (London, 1846) and in Arthur Saint-Leon's Il saltarello (Lisbon, 1854–6).

Saltellando (It.: 'skipping along'). A rarely used term; it is found in a treatise of Francesco Rognoni Taeggio (Selva, 1620), and may mean a species of slurred staccato, but it is not clear whether the bow leaves the string or stays on it.

Salter, Hans J(ulius) (b Vienna, 14 Jan 1896; d Studio City, CA, 23 July 1994). American composer and conductor of Austrian birth. He studied at the University of Vienna with Guido Adler, Egon Wellesz and Hans Gál, and at the Vienna Music Academy with Schreker. Later, while working as an assistant conductor in Viennese theatres, he studied conducting with Weingartner and composition with Berg. From 1930 to 1933 he composed musicals and drama scores for UFA Studios in Neubabelsberg. He emigrated to Hollywood in 1937.

Originally hired as an orchestrator for Universal Studios, Salter was soon promoted to the rank of composer. With Frank Skinner he wrote music for serials, westerns, dramas, Deanna Durbin musicals and Abbott and Costello comedies. Although he received six Academy Award nominations for his musical comedy and drama scores, he is remembered today chiefly for his contribution to horror films such as The Wolf Man (1941), Frankenstein Meets the Wolf Man (1943) and House of Frankenstein (1944). When he retired in 1967, he had completed scores for over 200 films. He was honoured with lifetime achievement awards from the Society of Horror, Science Fiction and Fantasy Films, and the Society for the Preservation of Film Music. He received an additional tribute at the Viennale Film Festival in 1993.

PRESTON NEAL JONES

Salter, Humphrey (fl 1682–?1723). English music publisher, editor and composer. He 'carefully composed and gathered' the music for one of the earliest English recorder tutors, The Genteel Companion, which he co-published with Richard Hunt in 1683. 'At the Lute in St Paul's Church-Yard', London, Salter published music alone or in conjunction with Alexander Livingston, Henry Playford, John Walsh, John Young and others until at least 1704. Two children of his were baptized at St Gregory by St Paul, London, in 1682 and 1687. Between 1718 and 1723 a man identified only as 'Mr Salter' was the beneficiary of three concerts at different London venues as well as a performance at the Lincoln's Inn Fields Theatre, with which he may have been associated.

DAVID LASOCKI

Salter, Lionel (Paul) (b London, 8 Sept 1914; d London, 1 March 2000). English harpsichordist, pianist, conductor, writer on music and administrator. He first studied under Yorke Trotter and Stanley Chapple (1923–31). After a year at the RCM he went to Cambridge, where he studied under Edward Dent and Boris Ord (1932–5; BA 1935, MusB 1936); he then had a further year's study at the RCM. He was a pupil of Constant Lambert for conducting and James Ching and Arthur Benjamin for the piano. He became known as a performer, especially on the radio, and also worked as a music assistant in BBC television. During war service he was guest conductor (1943–4) of the Radio France SO; returning to the BBC in 1945, he became assistant conductor of the BBC Theatre Orchestra and in 1948 music supervisor of the BBC European Service.

After holding various other posts, he moved in 1956 to television as head of music, where he did much to stimulate the television presentation of opera, ballet and concerts and was influential, internationally as well as in Britain, in the establishment of techniques for music programmes. In 1963 he became head of opera (responsible for both sound and television) and in 1967 assistant controller of music and editor (until 1975) of the BBC Music Guides. He retired from the BBC in 1974 and from 1972 to 1976 was opera coordinator and producer for the European Broadcasting Union.

Besides his administrative work, Salter was active as a harpsichordist (he took part in many performances with the Vienna Capella Academica and other ensembles) and writer: his field of knowledge was wide, with Iberian and Latin American music and keyboard music representing his special studies. He contributed chapters to many collective works and wrote regularly in periodicals (including, from 1948, Gramophone), earning respect for his clear, forthrightly expressed views and the breadth of his knowledge. He was also active as a conductor (particularly for films and television), lecturer, adjudicator, broadcaster, and composer and arranger (notably of music for radio plays). Salter also made more than 100 opera translations, for publication and for performance, and prepared performing editions of many Baroque works, among them Cavalli's Erismena, Lully's Alceste and sonatas by various composers.

Salt Lake City. Capital city of Utah, USA. Since its founding in 1847 by members of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints, or Mormons, the city has enjoyed an unusually rich musical life, with a reputation for outstanding choral and orchestral music, as well as theatre and dance. It is home to a prosperous film and recording industry, and three area radio stations are devoted to classical programming. Although many of its cultural institutions were transplanted from abandoned Mormon communities in the Midwest, recent decades have brought increasing diversity to the region's lively music scene. (See CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST OF LATTER-DAY SAINTS, MUSIC OF THE.)

The oldest and best-known of the city's musical organizations, founded in 1847, is the Salt Lake Mormon Tabernacle Choir. Its weekly broadcast 'Music and the Spoken Word' from the tabernacle on Temple Square has brought the choir's unique sound to an international audience since 1929. In addition to the choir's many open rehearsals and performances, Temple Square offers daily recitals on the tabernacle's famous Aeloian-Skinner organ and a popular concert series. In 1999 the Square's musical resources were expanded to include the Temple Square Chorale and the Orchestra at Temple Square. The adjacent Conference Center, completed in 2000, seats 21,000 in the main auditorium; its flexible design provides a variety of theatrical and musical configurations.

A small professional orchestra was formed in the early 1860s in connection with the Salt Lake Theatre (1862–1928), which represented musical as well as dramatic fare. Handel's Messiah, first performed there by the Handel and Haydn Society (later the Salt Lake Philharmonia Society) under London-trained George Careless in 1875, has been presented annually (except during the period 1942–4) by the Oratorio Society of Utah since 1915.

In 1892 the Salt Lake Theater Orchestra combined with musicians from the fire-ravaged Walker Opera House to form the first Utah SO, led by the Norwegian immigrant by Anton Pedersen. Successors to this orchestra performed at irregular intervals during the next half-century. In 1940 the Utah State SO was established by the Symphony Orchestra Association with Hans Heniot as conductor. Renamed the Utah SO, it attained fully professional status in 1946 under Werner Janssen, but achieved recognition largely through Maurice Abravanel, its music director from 1947 to 1979. Under his direction, recordings of works by Varèse, Milhaud, Gottschalk, Honegger and Satie, as well as one of the earliest recordings of the complete Mahler symphonies, won the Utah SO international acclaim. Abravanel was succeeded by Varujan Kojian (1979–83) and Joseph Silverstein (1983–98). In 1998 Keith Lockhart was named music director, with Pavel Kogan as principal guest conductor. The Utah SO performs in Maurice Abravanel Symphony Hall (opened in 1979 as Symphony Hall and named after Abravanel in 1992; see illustration). The Gina Bachauer International Piano Competition, formerly sponsored by the Utah SO but independent since 1986, has attained world-class recognition, with the major competition held every four years.

Opera, popular but sporadic in the 19th century, blossomed briefly in the 1920s in the Lucy Gates Grand Opera Company. Twenty years later, with imported principals such as the young Beverly Sills, opera and musical theatre reappeared in spectacular fashion in a celebrated summer festival held in the University of Utah's athletic stadium from 1947 to 1960. Finally, in 1977, the Utah Opera, a permanent resident company, was formed by Glade Peterson, sharing performance space with Ballet West (established 1968) in the restored Capitol Theatre.

Chamber music, nourished initially by the city's large European element, is fostered by the Salt Lake Chamber Music Society, the Abramyan String Quartet, Nova, Utah Chamber Artists, Canyonlands (avant garde) and the

Maurice Abravanel Symphony Hall, Salt Lake City, designed by FFKR, Inc, opened 1979

GAM Foundation (jazz). In recent years the Cathedral of the Madeleine's annual arts festival, together with its unique Choir School, has attracted a large audience. Some 30 amateur orchestras, as well as jazz and concert bands, and countless popular and ethnic ensembles, can be found in the metro area. Summer festivals in nearby ski resorts attract professionals from across the USA.

The University of Utah was founded in 1850; its music department was established in 1888 and is administered by the College of Fine Arts. Vladimir Ussachevsky established the university's electronic music studio in the 1960s and directed it until 1985. Completed in 2000, the university's David P. Gardner Music Centre contains a 700-seat concert hall and Lively-Fulcher organ, and the scores and memorabilia of Maurice Abravanel. Marriott Library holds the papers of the composers Arthur Shepherd and Leroy Robertson, and the musicologist Hugo Leichtentritt. The department of music offers degrees in music education, history, theory, performance and composition, as well as liberal studies. The Professional Violin Making School of America offers certified training in the construction of musical instruments.

Salut (Fr.). See BENEDICTION.

Salva, Tadeáš (b Lúčky pri Ružomberoku, 22 Oct 1937; d Bratislava, 3 Jan 1995). Slovak composer. From 1953 to 1958 he studied the cello, accordion and piano at the Žilina Conservatory and took private composition lessons with Zimmer. He continued his composition studies under Alexander Moyzes and Cikker at the Bratislava Academy of Music and Dramatic Arts; before graduating, however, he left for Poland to study with Szabelski at the Katowice State Higher School for Music. He worked for Czechoslovak radio in Košice (1965–8), as a producer at Czechoslovak television in Bratislava (from 1968) and, for a number of years, as dramaturge for the Slovak Folk Art Group. From 1991 to 1995 he was president of the Union of Slovak Composers.

The originality of Salva's music lies in its synthesis of archaic Slovak folk models and avant-garde compositional techniques. His compositions are based on modal melodies related through counterpoint. His music's metre is particularly flexible: frequent polyrhythmic and polymetric sections combine with Lutosławski's principle of framed aleatorism. A central part is often played by the human voice, singing or reciting. Although Salva's style is distinctly influenced by the Polish school, his musical vocabulary is highly individual. His aesthetic is most successfully expressed through the ballad, a highly emotional form which in this instance combines folk derived material with European avant-garde techniques. Margita a Besná (1971) and Plač ('Tears', 1978) were the first Slovak operas written for television and radio, respectively. The latter opera's contrapuntal sections are created solely by electro-acoustic sounds – multilayered, pre-recorded vocal lines. Many of Salva's works have won national and international awards, including the Silver Medal at the Musica Sacra festival in Rome (1968) for Requiem aeternam.

KATARÍNA LAKOTOVÁ

Salvador [Bahia]. City in Brazil, capital of the state of Bahia. Officially named Salvador da Bahia de todos os Santos, but commonly known as Bahia, it was the capital of the Portuguese colony until 1763, when Rio de Janeiro became the colonial administrative centre. The state of Bahia was the landing place of Álvares Cabral in 1500, Salador the first capital, the first episcopal see and the most active centre of the slave trade, and its importance is paramount for early Brazilian music history. It became a see in 1550 and an archbishopric in 1676. Music at the cathedral occupied a prominent place on special occasions as well as in the regular services. The position of mestre de capela was created in 1559 and held by Bartolomeu Pires (*c*1560–86), Francisco Borges da Cunha (1608–*c*1660), Joaquim Corrêa (1661–*c*1665), Antonio de Lima Carseres (1666–9), João de Lima (1670s), Frei Agostinho de Santa Mônica (*c*1683–*c*1703) and Caetano de Mello Jesus (early 18th century). To the latter has been attributed the writing of a recitative and aria for soprano and strings, dated 2 July 1759, the earliest known Brazilian art music composition. The vernacular text and the non-religious character of the piece suggest that cathedral musicians participated in secular musical life, as occurred in Spanish America. The post of organist at Bahia Cathedral was established in 1559, first held by Pedro da Fonseca (1560). Many other organists were active in the various churches and convents of Bahia by the end of the 16th century, particularly the Benedictine monks of the Mosteiro de S Bento. Nicolau de Miranda was organist at the church of Misericordia and the S Casa de Misericôrdia in the early 18th century.

Among the native musicians of the 17th century, several priests are praised in Barbosa Machado's Biblioteca lusitana (Lisbon, 1747), including Eusébio da Soledade de Matos (1629–92), brother of the famous poet Gregório de Matos. Church music reached its peak at Bahia during the 18th century. The St Cecilia brotherhood (a union of musicians) was established there in 1785 and was active into the next century; among its members were the native composers Damião Barbosa de Araújo (1778–1856) and José Pereira Rebouças (1789–1843).

The first opera houses in Bahia appeared in the early 18th century. The short-lived Teatro da Câmara Municipal (1728) was followed by the Casa da Ópera da Praia (1760) and the Teatro do Guadalupe, where Barbosa de Araújo conducted the orchestra and is said to have performed his opera buffa, A intriga amorosa. During the first half of the 19th century the Teatro S João (inaugurated in 1812) became the most important centre for visiting artists and lyric companies. Other lesser theatres opened during the 19th century, such as Ginásio Bonfim (1867) and Politeama Baiano (1882). The S João theatre was burnt down in 1922 and was not replaced until the 1950s, when the Teatro Castro Alves was built. The theatre is the venue for orchestral concerts, ballet and popular music events; in the 1980s it underwent major repairs, since when it has mounted a number of opera productions.

Although music was taught in the Bahia area from the early 17th century, it was only in 1818 that King João VI, then resident at Rio de Janeiro, created a chair of music to which he appointed José J. de Souza Negrão. He was succeeded in 1832 by Domingos da Rocha Mussurunga, who proposed the first local conservatory of music. With the foundation of the Academia de Belas Artes (1877) music instruction came under the supervision of the state of Bahia. The official conservatory opened in 1897, was reorganized a year later by Silvio Deolindo Fróes, and a few years later became the Instituto de Música da Bahia. It remained the main educational institution until 1934, when the Escola Normal de Música (Escola de Música da Bahia from 1951) was founded under Petro Jatobá. The music educationist Zulmira Silvany contributed to the institute's excellence. The third important music school, called Seminários Livres de Música, was founded in 1954 at the University of Bahia. Under the direction of the German composer Hans J. Koellreutter (1954–63) it became a dynamic centre for new music during the 1960s; the Grupo de Compositores da Bahia was organized there in 1966 through the efforts of Ernt Widmer, and included young composers such as Jamary Oliveira, Lindembergue Cardoso and Paulo Costa Lima.

The first symphony orchestra in Salvador was organized in 1944 by Father Luiz Gonzaga Mariz and lasted until about 1952. Several instrumental and vocal ensembles as well as a symphony orchestra are active at the Federal University of Bahia. The Orquestra Sinfônica da Bahia, under various local conductors, has given a regular season of concerts since the late 1970s.

Concert-promoting associations have included the Sociedade de Cultura Artística da Bahia (SCAB), founded in 1945, and the Cruzada da Boa Vontade (1956), both merged into the Associação Baiana de Arte in 1958.

Salvador is a particularly important centre of black Brazilian musical culture. A large portion of the city's population practise African-related religions, generically called candomblé, with rich and varied musical repertories that sustain religious life. In addition, the city has been a major centre in the history of 20th-century Brazilian popular music, generating since the late 1940s some of the most celebrated figures of popular music, from Dorival Cymmi and João Gilberto to Gilberto Gil and Caetano Veloso. Specific genres, some of them associated with the celebration of Carnival, such as afoxé, capoeira, bloco afro and timbalada, were created there.

GERARD BÉHAGUE

Salvador, Matilde (b 23 March 1918). Spanish composer. She studied in Castellón and Valencia, where her first compositions were performed. During the Spanish Civil War she studied composition and orchestration with Asencio (whom she later married), and she won some prizes for her songs. In 1943, despite official disapproval, she arranged the première of her first opera, La filla del Rei Barbut. Her most creative period was in the 1950s and 60s, when her two ballets El segoviano esquivo and El sortilegio de la luna, several choral works, songs (based on texts by Catalonian and Valencian poets) and pieces for guitar and piano were performed by leading Spanish musicians. On 24 January 1974 her second opera, Vinatea, was performed at the Gran Teatro del Liceo in Barcelona and then in Castellón and Valencia. Her personal situation improved after Franco's death: she obtained grants and prizes, and is now recognized as the leading female Spanish composer of the century.

Salvador's aesthetic is a continuation of Falla's nationalist aesthetic; this is especially true of her vocal music, which combines Valencian musical traditions with contemporary harmonic language. Her sister, Josefina, was an outstanding violinist.

MARUXA BALIÑAS-PEREZ

Salvador-Daniel See DANIEL, FRANCISCO SALVADOR.

Salvadori, Andrea (b Florence, 1591; bur. Florence, 25 Aug 1634). Italian poet and librettist. He was educated in the Collegio Romano and employed by the Medici family. His first contribution to Medici court entertainments was in 1613, and, according to the court diarist Cesare Tinghi, he was placed on the salary rolls on 23 October 1616. From then until his death he was the principal court poet in Florence. His most significant contribution was to sacred opera, which flourished in Florence from 1621 to 1628. In the argomento to La regina Sant'Orsola (Florence, 1624; lib pubd 1625), his first work in this genre (set by Marco da Gagliano), he claimed to have invented this type of sacred entertainment. His second azzione sacra, La Giuditta (La istoria di Iudit) (1626), with music by Gagliano, was performed in Florence for Cardinal Francesco Barberini and a papal legation that included Rospigliosi; it may have influenced Rospigliosi's own sacred opera librettos, which began to appear five years later. La Giuditta was also the source for Opitz's Judith (1635). Gagliano also collaborated with Salvadori on secular operas, namely La sposalizio di Medoro et Angelica (1619) and La Flora (1628); the libretto for a third opera by Peri, Iole ed Ercole, is lost except for a single lament. In his librettos Salvadori made extensive use of the chorus as a formal device, concluding each act with one and often using choral refrains to frame solo stanzas or to link scenes within an act. Most of his important works were published posthumously in Poesie (Rome, 1668).

KELLEY HARNESS

Salvadori, Angelo (fl 1618–28). Italian music printer. He does not appear to be related to the contemporary librettist of the same name. He printed in Vicenza and Venice and is most important for Galeazzo Sabbatini's Regola facile (1628), Lodovico Monte's Vago fior (probably printed in the mid-1620s) and a series of five volumes of canzonettas (RISM 1618[17], 1620[22], 1622[20], 1623[11], *c*1625[12]) of which at least three went into second editions.

STANLEY BOORMAN

Salvai, Maria Maddalena (b Florence; fl 1716–37). Italian soprano. In 1716 she was in the service of the Landgrave of Kassel; she sang at Darmstadt between 1718 and 1719, then at Dresden. Recommended by Senesino for her 'most beautiful voice', she joined the Royal Academy in London in September 1720 at the same time as Senesino and remained for two seasons, making her début as Polissena in Handel's Radamisto. She sang in Arsace (Orlandini-Amadei) and the first performances of the composite Muzio Scevola (Fidalma), Handel's Floridante (Rossane) and Giovanni Bononcini's Crispo and Griselda, as well as a number of concerts. She had a high tessitura and a compass of e' to b♭'', but seems not to have been an exceptional singer. She sang at Bologna and Genoa in 1724 and Milan in 1725, and appeared in two operas at Venice in 1722–3, four at Naples (including Vinci's Ernelinda and Hasse's Sesostrate) in 1726–7, two at Florence in 1727–8, and three more there in 1730–31. She was engaged for Vienna in 1732 and unsuccessfully approached for Florence in 1737. Salvai was her married name (her husband was a colonel); Sartori identifies her with Maddalena Frigieri, who sang at Venice in 1711–2 and Turin in 1726 and 1730. There is a caricature of Salvai by A.M. Zanetti in the Cini collection (I-Vgc).

Salvation Army, music of the.

1. Origins and history. 2. Music, worship and training.

1. ORIGINS AND HISTORY. The founder of the Salvation Army, William Booth (1829–1912), was a former Wesleyan Methodist minister whose experience as a pawnbroker's assistant in Nottingham inspired him to take the gospel to the poor and socially unacceptable. The movement began in the slums of Whitechapel in 1865 as the East London Christian Mission. Although Booth did not originally envisage the expansion of his mission into a larger organization, new 'stations' were soon established. His movement took the name of the Salvation Army in 1878; its organization and hierarchy were based upon that of the British army, and Booth became its first General.

In 1868 Booth issued the Christian Mission Hymn Book, a compilation of hymns specifically designed for his organization, and in 1875 he published a further collection of hymns, Revival Music, this time including tunes. A third collection, Salvation Army Songs, followed in 1878, from which time the term 'song' has generally replaced 'hymn' in Salvation Army music.

Music was never intended to become a major feature of the Salvation Army, but from the beginning the movement attracted a number of individuals who were also instrumentalists. Of particular importance was the Methodist Fry family of Salisbury, who supported Booth when he visited the city in 1878 by performing as a brass quartet, attracting the crowd with their playing and assisting the singing. The Fry family travelled around Britain with Booth and, following their model, other bands were founded throughout the country wherever the Army began its work. By the 1880s the association between the Salvation Army and instrumental bands was well established.

In his preface to the first volume of Salvation Music (1880) Booth justified on pragmatic grounds the 'consecration' of secular melodies. While the words carried the the 'gospel message', it was the tunes that attracted the audience. His principle of function above aesthetics had a significant effect on the use of music in the Army's ministry, and the adoption of secular melodies as settings for religious texts became a well-known characteristic of the movement. The Army's early songbooks, such as the two volumes of Salvation Music (1880, 1883), drew upon a wide variety of musical sources, including music-hall tunes and the American gospel and minstrel traditions, as well as the standard Victorian hymn repertory.

The War Cry, the Army's official weekly publication, encouraged Salvationists to form bands and carried requests for instruments of all kinds. At first this resulted in some unusual instrumental combinations, but eventually the brass band became the standard Salvation Army ensemble. Originally, local musicians taught the newly established bands, which played whatever music was available and performed hymn arrangements from manuscript scores. However, the lack of a formal structure and the absence of a common repertory meant that the different bands could not perform together at rallies. In 1883, therefore, a Music Department was established under the direction of Lt-Col. Richard Slater (1854–1939), a professional musician and a new recruit to the Salvation Army. Slater also became the first editor of the Army's music publishing section; his successor Col. Frederick Hawkes further developed its structure.

During the 1880s there was a flood of creative activity within the Salvation Army: in 1884 a tune book for bands was produced and a band journal launched; in 1889 a new book was issued together with band parts. Updated tune books and songbooks drawing on a variety of sources – sacred, secular and original compositions – have since appeared at about 30-year intervals; all include band arrangements. In 1891 the International Staff Band was officially established, with Frederick Fry as its conductor; this band soon became the leading musical ensemble of the Army, a position that it maintains today.

Although Booth himself resisted the development of Salvation Army choirs, in 1882 groups of officer-cadets began to tour Britain both playing and singing; the songs were often composed by group members. These tours produced two important results: the songs that became popular were sold, leading in 1886 to the publication of the first issue of the The Musical Salvationist for choir (its title changed in 1994 to Sing to the Lord); and the founding of choirs, or 'songster brigades', in 1896. Parallel youth sections to both songster brigades (from 1920) and bands (from *c*1900) have also been established. In 1963 Major Joy Webb pioneered the use of combo-style groups with 'The Joystrings'.

2. MUSIC, WORSHIP AND TRAINING. The use of music within the Salvation Army falls into three categories: worship; outdoor; and concerts or festivals. In worship the congregational singing is simple and direct and accompanied by a keyboard or brass ensemble. Contemporary song styles during the latter part of the 20th century have encouraged the appearance of ad hoc 'worship bands'. Of the instruments originally used in services the concertina has disappeared, and the tambourine, which was struck during the singing, has been replaced by 'timbrel groups' who perform drills to band music.

In the service, or 'meeting', the songster brigade sings a song, anthem or through-composed arrangement. A more recent influence from America is the singing of a unison or two-part song, often strongly rhythmic, accompanied by a piano. The band, in addition to its role as accompanist, might perform a solo piece – either a song selection, an arrangement or a short original work. Junior choirs and bands also participate in meetings.

The Salvation Army is active in some 90 countries where English is not the first language. In these countries the words of many of the traditional songs are translations of the English originals, but national material is also used. Local musical practices are respected, with indigenous instruments often accompanying the singing during worship. However, the brass band is still regarded throughout the world as the most authentic expression of Salvation Army music.

Outdoor music has traditionally been part of the Salvation Army's missionary work, for example, the playing of a brass band to attract an audience. However, where the general public is no longer familiar with a wide repertory of hymns, as in Great Britain, brass bands perform a range of short, attractive pieces as well as sacred songs. Salvation Army bands still take part in processional marches, but street evangelism has tended to decrease in favour of visits to prisons, hospitals and residential homes.

Concerts given by Army music groups must include a prayer and a Bible reading. Extended presentations may incorporate mime and multimedia elements or take the form of musicals; some of the songs from the musicals of Commissioners John Gowans and John Larsson have been adopted for congregational use in meetings. Particularly important in the establishment of massed festivals in Britain were the composers Commissioner Sir Dean Goffin (1916–84) and Lt-Col. Norman Bearcroft. A number of traditional brass bands, in addition to their worship duties, make broadcasts, issue recordings and organize overseas tours.

The musical training provided by the Salvation Army is organized at local, national and international levels. Music schools and camps established worldwide provide intensive and specialized teaching in subjects such as performance, ensemble playing, conducting, music theory and various styles of composition. In the USA there is a national development programme led by regional 'Music Directors'. At the international level, the Army organizes conferences and runs a two-year correspondence course for bandmasters.

Many musicians originally trained by the Salvation Army have also become professional performers, conductors, composers and academics. Prominent names both within and without the Salvation Army include the British composers Eric Ball (1903–89), largely remembered for his works for brass band, including The Kingdom Triumphant, Sidney Cox (1887–1975), many of whose songs appear in Army song books, and the 'march kings' Col. Bramwell Coles (1887–1960) and George Marshall (1887–1956); and the Americans Erik Leidzén (1894–1962) and Emil Söderström (1900–72). Important composers since World War II include Lt-Col. Ray Bowes, Major Leslie Condon, Wilfred Heaton (Toccata), Commissioner Sir Dean Goffin (My Strength, my Tower) James Curnow, William Himes, Robert Redhead and Lt-Col. Ray Steadman-Allen, whose avant-garde approach and editorship has significantly influenced younger composers. Composers who were not members of the Salvation Army but who wrote for its music sections include J.P. Sousa (The Salvation Army March), Vaughan Williams (Prelude on Three Welsh Hymn Tunes) and Michael Tippett (the hymn tune 'Wadhurst').

Before 1993 all the music used by the Salvation Army was performed only by authority of the General, who was represented internationally by regional Music Councils. Since 1993 vocal music has been exempt from such central control, but bands must still play only music that is published by the Salvation Army. The main centre of the movement's music publishing is London, but a substantial division has been established in the United States; Scandinavia and the Netherlands also publish a significant amount of material.

Music for instrumental performance is issued in quarterly or half-yearly journals, each containing four or five pieces (marches, song arrangements etc.) and graded according to four categories: General, Festival, Triumph (for reduced instrumentation) and Unity (for five-part ensembles). About 55 pieces are published annually in such journals, although long works are sometimes printed individually. American journals often include extra parts, enabling works to be played by wind bands as well as brass ensembles. A wide range of music is published for concert performance, including solo works, standard pieces for brass band and transcriptions of classical pieces.

The choral music journal Sing to the Lord (formerly The Musical Salvationist) includes strophic songs, anthems, through-composed pieces and arrangements. Song collections, music for soloists, and works for male, female and children's voices are also published regularly. About 60 vocal works are issued annually.

Original music composed for the Salvation Army is expected to have a Christian theme. Composers do not receive royalties; their contributions are contractually donated. Much music is also exchanged in manuscript within the close-knit Salvation Army community.

RAY STEADMAN-ALLEN

Salvatore, Giovanni (b Castelvenere, nr Benevento, early 17th century; d probably Naples, ?1688). Italian composer and organist. He was almost certainly a pupil of G.M. Sabino and Erasmo Bartoli ('Padre Raimo') at the Conservatorio della Pietà dei Turchini at Naples. Later he became a priest. In 1641 he was organist of SS Severino e Sossio, Naples, and later organist and maestro di cappella of S Lorenzo Maggiore. From 1662 to 1673 he taught at the Conservatorio della Pietà dei Turchini. During his last years he was rector and maestro di cappella of the Conservatorio dei Poveri di Gesù Cristo; as his successor was appointed in 1688 he probably died in that year. It was once thought that he taught Alessandro Scarlatti but this is unlikely.

According to Liberati and Pitoni, Salvatore was greatly esteemed during his lifetime. Liberati even placed him above Frescobaldi on the grounds that he could compose fine vocal works without confusing their style with organ music. The vocal music has not yet been published or critically investigated. The larger works are written in the concertato style typical of the mid-17th century, with effective progressions and expressive dissonances but a limited harmonic idiom. Homorhythmic chordal and imitative textures alternate between the first and second choirs, both of which are skilfully combined with instrumental sinfonias. Contrasting metres and textures and occasional word-painting are characteristic. A set of four-voice responsories for the Office of the Dead are simpler in style. The organ works in the Ricercari, written in open score, demonstrate much technical skill. They are in the southern Italian tradition of the early 17th century as represented by Mayone, Trabaci and Frescobaldi, and though they do not depart radically from it in style or form, they are more tonal, close-knit and concisely organized. Salvatore occasionally used durezze e ligature (chromaticism, sharp dissonances and striking harmonic progressions) and the unpredictable, virtuoso, rhapsodic style associated with the Neapolitans and the Romans. The volume contains eight contrapuntally interesting ricercares, one on each of the eight tones, with two, three or four subjects and their permutations. In no.4 the four subjects, having been treated at length in their original forms, appear in turn in traditional cantus-firmus settings; in no.8 the hymn Iste confessor is presented as a cantus firmus in each voice. Despite its title the volume also includes other music. In three canzonas the opening section is repeated at the end; a fourth is a set of contrapuntal variations on the bergamasca melody, reaching a brilliant concluding virtuoso climax. Three organ masses include Kyrie settings based on the melodies Orbis factor, Cunctipotens genitor and Cum jubilo; brief versets in imitative or toccata style are intended for alternation with a choir. Salvatore appended a brief treatise, Breve regola per rispondere al choro, to the third printing of G.B. Olifante's Porta aurea sive directorium chori (Naples, 1641).

BARTON HUDSON

Salvayre, (Gervais Bernard) Gaston (b Toulouse, 24 June 1847; d Saint-Ague, nr Toulouse, 17 May 1916). French composer and critic. He was a pupil at the Toulouse Conservatory and later the Paris Conservatoire, where he studied with Marmontel (piano), Benoist (organ), Bazin (harmony) and Thomas (composition). He won the premier prix for organ in 1868 and, after five unsuccessful attempts, the Prix de Rome in 1872 with Calypso. His subsequent stay in Rome was quite productive; on his return to Paris he presented an Ouverture symphonique (1874), ballet music for the revival of Grisar's Les amours du diable (1874) and the symphonie biblique La résurrection (1876, retitled La vallée de Josaphat in 1882). In 1877 he was appointed chorus master of the Opéra Populaire at the Théâtre du Châtelet; in the same year he made an inauspicious operatic début with Le bravo and presented a ballet, Fandango. Later stage works, including Richard III (1883), Egmont (1886) and Dumas' La dame de Monsoreau (commissioned by the Opéra, 1888), did little to advance his reputation as an opera composer, yet he composed several more dramatic pieces; the only one of these to be staged was Solange (1909), which was hailed as a success by the critic Brétigny. His other compositions include major choral works, such as the Stabat mater (1877) and his last work, the fresque musicale Sainte-Geneviève (performed posthumously at Monte Carlo, 1919), as well as numerous songs and some chamber and piano music. Salvayre was a music critic for Gil Blas for many years. In 1880 he was made a Chevalier of the Légion d'Honneur.

JOHN TREVITT

Salve regina (Lat.: 'Hail, queen'). One of the four large-scale Marian antiphons. Following medieval Roman and Franciscan custom, it is now sung at the end of Compline from Trinity Sunday to the Saturday before the first Sunday of Advent. It was also sung on a variety of other occasions during the later Middle Ages and even lent its name to a Marian devotion, the Salve service.

The exact origins of the Salve regina are unclear. The earliest surviving manuscript known to include the antiphon is F-Pn n.a.1412, a Cistercian antiphoner dating from 1150–60 from the abbey of Movimondo near Milan. This may imply a Cistercian origin, a theory supported by Canal and others with parallel passages from the writings of St Bernard of Clairvaux; similar arguments can also be adduced in favour of other Cistercian authors. The Movimondo manuscript gives the melody in Aquitanian neumes, and most of the earliest sources, from the late 12th and early 13th centuries, originate from Aquitaine or have French connections. The most important of these, the Auxerre Pontifical F-Pn lat.744, is also a Cistercian manuscript. A second possible place of origin is Cluny, where in 1135, when Peter the Venerable was abbot, a resolution was passed requiring the antiphon to be sung during processions. Proposed attributions to Adhemar of Le Puy (d 1098), Hermannus Contractus (d 1054) and others rest on still flimsier evidence. It is clear nonetheless that the text of the antiphon draws on a type of Marian theology that was still new at the beginning of the 12th century.

The well-known 1st-mode melody appears in the Movimondo manuscript and the early Aquitanian sources in a variety of different forms, some largely syllabic, others much more ornate. The Cistercian manuscripts generally give the simplest versions, but this may be due as much to artistic choice (possibly drawing on an originally oral tradition of the melody) as to their early date. Some German manuscripts have an unrelated melody in the 3rd mode. After 1218 the Cistercians adopted it as a daily processional chant, and from 1230 it was sung each day after Compline by Dominican orders.

From the early 15th century, if not before, the Salve regina was sung as part of various new devotions in honour of the Virgin Mary. Normally financed by the laity, these devotions often made generous provisions for music; the singing of the antiphon itself was often entrusted to boys from the choir school. Some of the most opulent of these services were held by lay religious societies of which one of the most brilliant was the Marian confraternity in Antwerp. According to their charter of 1482, the confraternity was organized to celebrate a daily devotional service between five and six o'clock in the evening. This Salve service employed four singers, 12 choirboys, a choirmaster, an organist and a priest, and was preceded by the ringing of the church bells. The confraternity included among its members Obrecht and Noel Bauldeweyn. Du Fay was a member of the Salve chapel of St Géry at Cambrai, and Pierre de La Rue of the Confraternity of Our Lady at 's-Hertogenbosch.

The importance of Salve regina within the Salve service is mirrored in the great number of polyphonic settings of the antiphon from the Renaissance. English composers of the 15th century wrote numerous settings, as did those 16th-century Spanish composers who were influenced by the Netherlandish court of Charles V. More than 127 polyphonic settings can be attributed to Netherlandish composers active between 1425 and 1550. All these exhibit a strong dependence on the cantus firmus, and their structural divisions generally reflect the textual divisions. A number of polyphonic compositions for voices set only the even-numbered verses (i.e. Vita dulcedo; Ad te suspiramus; Et Jesum; O pia), leaving the odd-numbered verses to be sung in plainchant. The reverse is true of the compositions for organ, which usually include only the odd-numbered verses (Salve regina; Ad te clamamus; Eia ergo; O clemens; O dulcis). Netherlandish composers represented by vocal settings include Alexander Agricola (three), Gombert (four), La Rue (six), Josquin (two), Obrecht (three) and Ockeghem (two). Composers of settings for organ include Paul Hofhaimer, Hans Kotter (two) and Arnolt Schlick.

Salvetti, Guido (b Varese, 7 Oct 1940). Italian musicologist. He completed a piano diploma in 1960 with Pietro Montani, and continued his piano studies with Guido Agosti at the Accademia Chigiana in Siena, where he also studied choral conducting with Nino Antonellini. He graduated in humanities (1963) and philosophy (1967), and took a diploma in composition in 1976. From 1979 he taught music history at the Milan Conservatory and founded the Diploma in musicology (1984); he became director of the same conservatory in 1996. He has held seminars in Vicenza, Parma and Carpi and is a board member of the Società Italiana di Musicologia, of which he was vice-president, 1976–9. His writings focus on 18th- and 19th-century Italian instrumental music (particularly the string quartet and the works of Luigi Boccherini), Italian opera in the second half of the 19th century, 20th-century Italian music, and the relationship between text and music in salon song of the late 19th and early 20th centuries.

TERESA M. GIALDRONI

Salvi, Antonio (b Lucignano, 17 Jan 1664; d Florence, 21 May 1724). Italian librettist. He was a physician in the service of the ducal court in Florence and the favourite librettist of Prince Ferdinand de' Medici. Between 1701 and 1710 he wrote seven drammi per musica for the entertainments the prince gave in his villa at Pratolino, and he wrote others for the public theatres of Livorno and Florence from 1694 to 1718, the year in which his Scanderbeg was performed to music by Vivaldi for the re-opening of the Teatro della Pergola. After the death of Ferdinand (1713) he accepted commissions outside Tuscany and wrote for theatres in Rome, Reggio nell'Emilia, Turin, Munich and Venice. His librettos were set by the greatest composers of the day, including Perti, Alessandro Scarlatti, Gasparini and Vivaldi. Some of them were successful and were revived many times, mostly with other music; in particular Astianatte (1701, also known with the title Andromaca) and Amore e maestà (1715, sometimes set as Arsace). Handel often used them for his operas. In the context of the so-called Arcadian reform, Salvi's work is distinguished for its simplicity of style, regularity of formal structure and above all for the prevalence of emotional content. These modern characteristics reflect to some extent the influence of French classical theatre, from which a few of his intermezzos also derive: L'artigiano gentiluomo, Il malato immaginario and L'avaro are after works of Molière. Il marito giocatore e la moglie bacchettona (or Serpilla e Bacocco) is one of the most famous examples of the 18th-century intermezzo.

FRANCESCO GIUNTINI

Salvi, Victor (b Chicago, 4 March 1920). American harp maker of Italian origin. The youngest son of the immigrant Venetian instrument maker Rudolfo Salvi (1865–1943), he began his career as a harpist in 1938; his half-brother Alberto (b Venice, 13 Dec 1893; d Lake Zurich, IL, 19 Oct 1983) and his sister Aida (b Viggiano, 1 March 1905; d Nashville, TN, 1996) were also harpists. Establishing his professional career, Victor Salvi played with the US Navy Band (1942–6), and as soloist with the St Louis Sinfonietta (1948–50). Meanwhile he had opened his own harp repair shop in Chicago (1945), and when he moved to New York (1949) he opened another in Manhattan. Continuing his orchestral career, he was harpist for Menotti's operas The Consul (1950) and The Saint of Bleecker Street (1954) on Broadway, and played with the New York PO and NBC SO under such conductors as Toscanini, Szell, Monteux and Mitropoulos. He completed his first harp in New York in 1954 and the following year left for Italy, where he established a harp factory in Genoa, his first harps going on sale in 1957. In 1968 larger premises were acquired at Vignole Borbera, and in 1969 he opened a shop for distribution and repairs in Covent Garden, London. The same year he acquired a factory in Sainte Croix, Switzerland, where craftsmen trained in making watches, mechanical music boxes and automatons took over the mechanical aspects of the harp's construction. Further new premises specializing in woodworking were acquired in Piasco, near Cuneo, and thus, by combining the Italian skills of carving and veneering with the Swiss ones of superb mechanical engineering, a harp of exceptional quality was assured. As a result, Salvi was awarded the first prize at the Mostra del Artigianato held in Florence in 1970.

Some nine different models of pedal harp entered the Salvi catalogue, and in 1978, in celebration of 25 years of harpmaking, two special harps were inlaid with 14 different materials including precious woods, ivory and mother-of-pearl. A specially sculpted harp was bought by the Metropolitan Museum of Art in New York. Also in 1978, Salvi acquired the Erard premises in the Salle Gaveau, Paris, along with the goodwill of the harp-manufacturing section of Gaveau-Erard. Distribution outlets were established in Paris (1970), Santa Monica (1975) and Tokyo (1981), and finally, in 1987, Salvi not only added a successful electronic harp to his range, but also acquired the prestigious Chicago firm of Lyon & Healy. Lyon & Healy harps continued to be made in Chicago, whereas the Salvi harps continued to be made in Italy, and imported into the USA. In England a further acquisition was that of Bow Brand strings.

Victor Salvi was President of the World Harp Festival in Cardiff in 1994, and sponsors masterclasses, recitals and competitions where he has donated harps as prizes, such as the Israel (1988, 1992 and 1998), the USA International (Indiana, 1989, 1992, 1995 and 1998), the Moscow (1997) and the Lily Laskine (Paris, 1993, 1996 and 1999) competitions. He was awarded the World Harp Congress's Award of Recognition for Service to the International Harp Community (1996), the Premio Flamalgal from the city of San Remo (1997), and Honorary Citizenship of the City of Viggiano (1999).

ANN GRIFFITHS

Salvini-Donatelli, Fanny [Lucchi, Francesca] (b Florence, ?1815; d Milan, June 1891). Italian soprano. She made her début at the Teatro di Apollo, Venice, in 1839 in Il barbiere di Siviglia. Engaged in Vienna 1842–3, she sang Abigaille in Nabucco under Verdi's supervision. She created the role of Violetta in La traviata at La Fenice, Venice (6 March 1853), and was blamed indirectly for the work's failure, supposedly because she weighed 'precisely 130 kilograms'. Other Verdi roles included Lady Macbeth, Lucrezia (I due foscari) and Elvire (Ernani). After engagements throughout Europe, she sang in Paris and at Drury Lane in London in 1858. She retired the following year but made further appearances in 1865. Berlioz and the London critics esteemed her voice, which was expressive, flexible and lyric and which accommodated itself to dramatic roles.

CHARLES A. JAHANT

Salviucci, Giovanni (b Rome, 26 Oct 1907; d Rome, 4 Sept 1937). Italian composer. A pupil of Respighi and Casella, he also read law at Rome University. Subsequently he taught counterpoint and fugue at the Istituto M. Clementi in Rome, and wrote music criticism for the Rassegna nazionale. His early death cut short a career so promising that some believe he would have ranked with Dallapiccola and Petrassi. The earliest important works bear the imprints of both Salviucci's teachers; yet they already have a lyrical spontaneity which is his own. In the Sinfonia da camera, the most successful of these early works, he achieved a lithe, springy, neo-madrigalian exuberance, deploying his instrumental forces with a mastery not found in all his compositions.

The two orchestral pieces of 1934, though perhaps less perfectly realized, branch out in a new direction – they are fiercer, more chromatic, more rugged in rhythm. Salviucci now revealed a growing affinity with the more tense, involuted aspects of Casella's art that also influenced the young Petrassi. Several passages (e.g. the extraordinary end to the 'Introduzione' of the Introduzione, passacaglia e finale, with jagged melodic fragments set against a hypnotically reiterated G on the strings) have the visionary uniqueness of genius. It is, however, in his last two works that Salviucci gave the fullest indication of his potential. Alcesti is a choral piece comparable in stature with Petrassi's Salmo ix or Dallapiccola's Cori di Michelangelo, without resembling either. The firmly linear, dissonant yet still basically diatonic fabric retains certain similarities to Casella, but the many incidental chromatic inflections, often producing poignant false relations, are unlike anything else, and ideally suited to the text. Even more original, though lighter, is the Serenata, whose debt to Casella is limited to a few component melodic and rhythmic details, and to the medium, clearly suggested by the older composer's work of the same title. The result is wholly personal – not least in the first movement, abundant in its outpouring of unpredictable yet logical images and textures, and with a nervous energy which carries all before it.

JOHN C.G. WATERHOUSE

Salway, Thomas (*b c*1706; d London, 6 April 1743). English tenor and actor. He was a treble at Cannons under Pepusch and then a popular singer, mainly in Rich's company at Lincoln's Inn Fields and Covent Garden, from 1724 until shortly before his death. He sang between the acts, in ballad operas and afterpieces, burlesques and pantomimes. Henry Carey wrote of him as one of the three leading English singers: 'There's Beard, and there's Salway, and smart Kitty Clive'. He took the title role in Gay's ballad opera Achilles, where the hero is disguised as a woman throughout, had other petticoat roles, and in 1737 created the dragon-despatching Moore of Moore Hall in Lampe's parody of Italian opera, The Dragon of Wantley. In March 1731 he was Damon in the first public performance of Handel's Acis and Galatea, and he sang for Handel at Oxford in 1733.

OLIVE BALDWIN, THELMA WILSON

Salzburg. City in Austria. From its founding in the 8th century until the dissolution of the archdiocese in 1806, it was the seat of a series of prince-archbishops whose court was the centre of the city's musical life. Salzburg was incorporated into Austria in 1816; in the 20th century it became specially noted for its festival.

1. To 1600. 2. 17th and 18th centuries. 3. 19th and 20th centuries. 4. The Salzburg Festival.

1. To 1600. The two most important centres for the development of liturgical chant in Salzburg and its missionary districts were the abbey of St Peter, founded by St Rupert, and the cathedral, founded by St Virgilius in 774. The earliest musical sources from St Peter are in St Gallen notation; those of the cathedral follow the Messine tradition. In 798 Arno, the first Archbishop of Salzburg (798–821), instructed that services at the cathedral were to be held 'following the tradition of the Romans'; statutes from 799 show that congregational hymns were permitted in addition to the psalm settings and songs sung by the monks. The earliest evidence for the practice of early polyphony in Salzburg is a 14th-century, gothically neumed graduale, in St Peter; a 12th-century copy of Aribo Scholasticus's De musica also survives there. A specifically Salzburg liturgy, recorded in an early breviary (A-Smi MII6), can be traced back to the last quarter of the 12th century; similarly important is the antiphoner of St Peter (A-Wn 2700) of around 1160, possibly commissioned by Abbot Heinrich I (later Bishop of Gurk).

The lively musical life of the city is documented by the presence there of instrument makers, bellfounders and other musicians. The position of cathedral Kantor, whose responsibilities included teaching singing, was established in 1223 by Archbishop Eberhard II (1220–46). Christmas and Easter were occasions for sacred non-liturgical or quasi-liturgical performances, often in dramatic form. One of the earliest such productions was the 'Bishop's play' for children, performed on the Feast of the Holy Innocents (28 December); this tradition continued until the time of Michael Haydn, whose Missa S Aloysii, composed for the Kapellknaben and dated 21 December 1777, is scored for two sopranos and alto together with violins and continuo. Although Eberhard is addressed in Neidhart von Reuental's 'Winter songs', there is no evidence that he was engaged at the Salzburg court; the same is true of the Minnesingers Hartwig von Rute, Pleier and Ulrich von Etzenbach.

In 1393 Archbishop Pilgrim von Puchheim (1365–96) founded the Pilgrimskapelle in the cathedral, where festive services were performed by up to 12 musicians and a 'beautiful and artful organ' that was dismantled only at the end of the 16th century. Pilgrim, known in particular for his secular sympathies, was patron to the Monk of Salzburg, the first poet–musician to write in German. His work is characterized by the introduction of liturgical (Gregorian), non-liturgical and popular elements in his melodies; they were frequently performed at Schloss Freisaal, a castle south of Salzburg. The Mondsee-Wiener Liederhandschrift, the earliest part of which includes songs by the Monk of Salzburg, bears witness to the lavish musical life of Salzburg's wealthy citizens; the manuscript was owned by the goldsmith Peter Spörl from, at the latest, 1472. At the same time, musical institutions proliferated in the city and in neighbouring towns such as Hofgastein and Radstadt. Not only the cathedral but also St Peter and the Stadtpfarrkirche (now the Franziskanerkirche) employed their own Kantors; the archbishops regularly employed city musicians as well as trumpeters and drummers.

With the spread of humanism, Salzburg became a leading early 16th-century centre of south German Renaissance art, particularly during the reign of Matthäus Lang (1519–40), who took into his court musicians from the former Hofkapelle of Maximilian I; both Heinrich Finck (from 1524) and the organist Paul Hofhaimer (from 1522) served under Lang. A document from 1526, probably incomplete, describes a music establishment with a Kapellmeister, two organists, a composer and six singers; eight boys sang in the choir. Hofhaimer's successors included Caspar Glanner and Kaspar Bockh, a prominent organ builder who in 1581 worked on the cathedral's small organ, built on a balcony 'on which the musicians might stand to execute their music on high feasts'. The Salzburg cathedral music was held in high esteem during Lang's reign; its virtues are praised by Ludwig Senfl in the foreword to his Liber selectarum cantionum (1520). It was during Lang's reign, too, that Johannes Stomius, who in 1530 founded a private school in Salzburg, wrote his Prima ad musicen instructio (Nuremberg, 1537), which includes discussions of solmization, modes and mensural theory. During the reign of Johann Jakob (1560–85), Lassus established connections with Salzburg; his second book of masses (1570) is dedicated to the archbishop. One Salzburg composer of the time was Sebastian Hassenknopf, whose 27 Sacrae cantiones were published in Munich in 1588. The first recorded printed music in Salzburg is a 1605 missal from the court printing press, founded in 1598 by Georg Kürner.

Inspired by his student years at the Collegio Germanico and the cappella of his uncle Marcus Sitticus Altems in Rome, Archbishop Wolf Dietrich von Raitenau (1587–1612) undertook a thorough reorganization of the court music, which was divided into four groups, nominally under separate administration: the court music proper (singers and instrumentalists) under the direction of the Obersthofmeisteramt; the court- and field-trumpeters, under the direction of the Oberststallmeister; the cathedral music (choral deacons and choristers), under the direction of the Domkapitel; and the choirboys. Much of the responsibility for establishing this new order fell to the Kapellmeister Tiburtio Massaino, who brought to Salzburg many prominent musicians from the court at Innsbruck. Among other liturgical reforms, Wolf Dietrich also introduced the Roman rite. The archbishop actively cultivated musical ties with the south: Agostino Agazzari's first book of Sacrum cantionum (1602) and Orazio Vecchi's Hymni qui per totum annum in Ecclesia Romana concinuntur (1604), as well as works by Leo Leoni and Jacobo Flori, were dedicated to him. He also began a number of important architectural projects that eventually transformed Salzburg, with its numerous fountains, open squares and churches, into 'the Rome of the north'; in doing so he established Italian precedents that were to dominate Salzburg's cultural life until the dissolution of the archdiocese.

2. 17TH AND 18TH CENTURIES. Wolf Dietrich's cousin and successor, Archbishop Marcus Sitticus von Hohenems (1612–19), a nephew of Carlo Borromeo, cultivated similar economic and cultural links with Italy; during his reign Salzburg enjoyed a first flowering of the Baroque. His first Kapellmeister was Francesco Turco from Verona. Marcus Sitticus was also among the first Salzburg archbishops to cultivate secular music; Aurelio Bonelli's Primo libro di villanelle a tre voci (1616) and Sigismondo d'India's third book of madrigals (1615), as well as Pietro Lappi's first book of four-, five- and six-voice masses (1613) and Pietro Pace's eighth book of motets (1619), were dedicated to him. In 1614 a stage on the Italian model was erected in the archbishop's residence and it was there that the first opera was performed outside Italy, a carnival performance in 1614 of Monteverdi's Orfeo (Seifert, 1988); this may have come about as a result of a visit to Salzburg by the first Orfeo, Francesco Rasi, who in 1612 presented the archbishop with a manuscript of monodic sacred and secular compositions titled Musiche da camera e chiesa. In 1615 the famous Steintheater was built at Schloss Hellbrunn, the archbishop's summer residence; it is the oldest surviving garden theatre in the German-speaking world.

A Benedictine gymnasium was founded in Salzburg in 1617 and in 1622, during the reign of Paris Lodron (1619–53), the Salzburg Benedictine university, later one of the most important centres in Salzburg for the cultivation of music and drama, was established. At first, however, music theatre was not widely cultivated; partly as a result of the Thirty Years War and local plagues, monthly expenses for the court music sank from 508 gulden in 1630 to only 85 gulden in 1651. The central event during Paris Lodron's reign was the completion and consecration in 1628 of a new cathedral; the Romanesque church of St Rupert had burnt down in 1589. The consecration is described in Thomas Weiss's Dedicatio salisburgensis (1629): among other works, a 12-chorus Te Deum by Hofkapellmeister Stefano Bernardi was sung. (The 53-part Missa salisburgensis, previously thought to have been written for this event by Orazio Benevoli, is almost certainly by Heinrich Biber; it was performed in 1682 to celebrate the 1100th anniversary of the founding of the archbishopric; fig.1.) Bernardi was succeeded in 1640 by Abraham Megerle, author of the important and partly autobiographical Speculum musico-mortale, das ist: Musicalischer Todtenspiegel (1672). Megerle is said to have written more than 2000 compositions, mostly for the church; few of them survive. His most important work may be the incompletely preserved Ara musica of 1647, which includes 108 settings of the Mass proper; these display the full range of performance options at Salzburg Cathedral and are among the earliest works to make deliberate use of the cathedral's four choir lofts.

The Bohemian-Austrian prince-archbishops of the second half of the 17th century, Guidobald Graf Thun (ruled 1654–68), Max Gandolph von Kuenburg (ruled 1668–87) and Johann Ernst Graf Thun (ruled 1687–1709), pursued political neutrality and circumspect fiscal management, both of which contributed to the court's stable and thriving cultural life; unlike their predecessors, they frequently hired and promoted northern composers, among them the Bohemian Heinrich Biber, the Alsatian Georg Muffat and Andreas Hofer from Reichenhall. Biber joined the court music in 1670; his early works for Salzburg are mostly instrumental music, including the Mystery Sonatas (probably dedicated to Max Gandolph before 1676) and two collections of ensemble music, the Sonatae tam aris quam aulis servientes (1676) and the Mensa sonora (1680). After his appointment as Kapellmeister in 1684, Biber turned more frequently to church music; he also wrote several stage works, all of which are lost except for the opera Chi la dura la vince (1687).

Muffat was the most international of 17th-century Salzburg composers: born in Savoy, a student of Lully in Paris, and active in Prague and Vienna before his appointment in 1678 as Salzburg court organist, he was sent by Archbishop Max Gandolph to Rome. There in 1682 he became acquainted with Corelli and Bernardo Pasquini, and learned 'the art of keyboard playing in the Italian style', reflected in his Armonico and Apparatus musico-organisticus. Muffat's opera Le fatali felicità di Plutone, now lost, was composed for the enthronement of Johann Ernst Graf Thun in 1687; the only surviving vocal work by him is the double-chorus Missa in labore requies. Although Muffat left Salzburg for Passau in 1690, he retained strong ties to the archdiocese: the Ausserlesener mit Ernst- und Lust-gemengter Instrumental-Music of 1701 is dedicated to the cathedral provost Maximilian Ernst von Scherffenberg. Muffat's synthesis of French, German and Italian styles put Salzburg squarely at the centre of late 17th-century musical life.

It was probably in connection with his duties at the Kapellhaus that Muffat wrote the Regulae concentuum partiturae (A-Wm I B7, dated 1699), a work that inspired generations of music theorists in Salzburg, including Johann Baptist Samber, whose Manductio ad organum (1704), Continuation ad manductionem organicam (1707) and Elucidatio musicae choralis (1710) cover elementary music theory, solmization, continuo, organ disposition and registration, and fugue. In 1719 Samber's pupil and successor as cathedral organist, Matthäus Gugl, published his Fundamentum partiturae in compendio data; a Partiturfundament, jointly attributed to Adlgasser and Michael Haydn, survives in St Peter (A-Sca Hay 2120.1). Leopold Mozart's Gründliche Violinschule of 1756 belongs to a different and specifically 18th-century tradition, that of the instrumental tutor.

At the end of the 17th century, the most important local genre in Salzburg was the Finalkomödie or school drama, a fusion of Italian opera and spoken pedagogical Benedictine play. Performed mainly at the Universitätstheater to mark the end of the academic year, music in the school dramas was at first restricted to choruses at the beginnings and ends of acts; by the 1670s the works consisted of a succession of recitatives and arias, based in part on the model of Italian opera. Until the closing of the Universitätstheater in 1778 by Archbishop Hieronymus Colloredo, the school drama was the highpoint of Salzburg's theatrical year; virtually every important composer in the archdiocese composed works for the Benedictine stage, including Biber, Matthias Sigismund Biechteler von Greiffenthal (Kapellmeister, 1706–43), Eberlin, Leopold Mozart, Anton Cajetan Adlgasser and Michael Haydn; Mozart's sole contribution to the genre is Die Schuldigkeit des ersten und fürnehmsten Gebottes, K35.

Following Biber's death in 1704, musical fashion in Salzburg took a decisive turn towards transalpine Italian models, in particular the works of Antonio Caldara, deputy Hofkapellmeister at Vienna. Caldara first visited Salzburg in 1712, when he was commissioned to write the solo cantata Quegl'ochhi vezzosi; his Il giubilo della salza was composed four years later to celebrate the name day of Archbishop Franz Anton von Harrach (1709–27). At least 19 of Caldara's operas and staged oratorios were performed in Salzburg between 1716 and 1727; in addition, the cathedral acquired numerous masses, offertories, vespers settings and other sacred works by him (now in A-Sd).

Harrach was succeeded by Leopold Anton Eleuthnerius, Baron of Firmian (1727–44), Jakob Ernst, Count of Liechtenstein (1745–7), and Siegmund Christoph, Count of Schrattenbach (1753–71). Schrattenbach in particular was lavish in his support of the court music; he was also the Mozarts' strongest supporter in Salzburg. Leopold Mozart, who joined the Salzburg court in 1743, advanced rapidly during Schrattenbach's tenure, serving from 1763 as deputy Kapellmeister. The archbishop also gave Wolfgang his first position at court, as unpaid third concertmaster, in 1769, and subsidized, at least in part, the Mozarts' travels abroad.

Church music represented the primary compositional obligation of the court musicians; the dominant composer in the mid-18th century was Ernst Eberlin, who in 1749 had been appointed Kapellmeister, succeeding Biber's son, Carl Heinrich. Many of Eberlin's works are written in a learned, late-Baroque stile antico; others rely on a harmonically static, but rhythmically complex, stile moderno. After Eberlin's death in 1762 a younger generation held sway, including his son-in-law Anton Cajetan Adlgasser (court and cathedral organist 1750–77), Leopold Mozart and Michael Haydn; less accomplished composers, among them Giuseppe Lolli, Franz Ignaz Lipp and Anton Ferdinand Paris, also contributed to the Salzburg Cathedral repertory. Independent orchestral music flourished as well, more or less contemporary with similar developments at Mannheim and Vienna; the creation of this modern repertory must be credited to Caspar Christelli, Ferdinand Seidl and Leopold Mozart. Seidl in particular was a prolific composer of partitas, multi-movement works usually scored for violins, bass and two trumpets; the chief exponent of the symphony was Leopold Mozart. Orchestral composers of the succeeding generation include Michael Haydn, Wenzelt Hebelt, Georg Scheicher, Joseph Hafeneder and, especially during the 1770s, W.A. Mozart.

Perhaps the most important orchestral genre was the serenade which, like the Benedictine school drama, owed its origin to the university. Every year in August, in connection with the university graduation ceremonies, the students had a substantial orchestral work performed for their professors. Typically these serenades consisted of an opening and closing march and between six and nine other movements, among them two or three concerto-like movements for various instruments. Although the origin of this tradition is unknown, serenades are documented as a regular fixture of the academic year by the mid-1740s. Leopold Mozart, who composed more than 30 such works by 1757, was the most important early composer in the genre; later examples by Michael Haydn, Joseph Hafeneder and W.A. Mozart also survive.

In addition to their duties at court, local musicians were active at other institutions throughout the city or in the surrounding region, including St Peter, the Dreifaltigkeitskirche, the Nonnberg convent and monasteries at Laufen an der Salzach and Tittmoning (both lower down the river Salzach in Bavaria), Michaelbeuern and Mattsee. The most important of these was St Peter, where the Musikkapelle consisted largely of students; the court musicians, especially the Mozarts and Michael Haydn, were also frequent guests and performers at the abbey. Leopold Mozart had composed works for St Peter as early as 1753, Mozart's Mass K66 was written for the ordination of Cajetan Hagenauer, son of the Mozarts' landlord, and when Hagenauer was elected abbot in 1786, Michael Haydn composed for him the Missa S Dominici. During the last years of the 18th century and early years of the 19th the dominant musical personality there was Johann Nepomuk Rainprechter (1752–1812), a student of Leopold Mozart and Michael Haydn; an important contemporaneous document is the 1822 Catalogus rerum musicarum pro choro figurato by Martin Bischofreiter (1762–1845), which describes the abbey's impressive holdings of sacred music. Musical activity at the Nonnberg convent, founded by St Rupert about 712, can similarly be traced back to the Middle Ages (Niiyama, 1994); although strict closure was in effect from the late 1500s, the court musicians sometimes appeared there, to celebrate the election of a new abbess, or when the archbishop himself celebrated mass. Nonnberg played an important role in the cultivation of German sacred songs in Salzburg; it also represented the only outlet for women composers, such as Barbara Eberlin. Farther afield was the parish church of Mariae Himmelfahrt in Laufen, completed in 1334, which during the early 17th century cultivated Italian, as well as local Bavarian and Austrian, music; the Mozarts were well acquainted with the music personnel there. Michael Haydn's influence was particularly strong at Michaelbeuern, where his friend and sometimes amanuensis Werigand Rettensteiner (1751–1822) served for a time as Chorregent (Hintermaier, 1985).

Significant changes in Salzburg's musical life came about with the election in 1772 of Schrattenbach's successor, Hieronymus Colloredo, Prince-Bishop of Gurk and second son of the imperial state vice-chancellor. Colloredo embarked almost immediately on an ambitious course to modernize the archdiocese. The school system was overhauled along Viennese lines and in 1778 the Universitätstheater was closed. This gap in Salzburg's theatrical life was made good in part by the creation of a public theatre in 1775, when Colloredo ordered that the Ballhaus in the Hannibalgarten (today the Makartplatz and site of the Landestheater) be rebuilt at the city's expense as a theatre for spoken drama and opera. The first troupe to play there, directed by Carl Wahr, included in its repertory Regnard's Der Zerstreute, with entr'actes by Joseph Haydn (Symphony no.60, 'Il distratto'), and Gebler's Thamos, König in Aegypten, which may have been performed with incidental music by Mozart. Nevertheless, the theatre offered local composers little to replace the former Benedictine drama, and few of them contributed to its productions.

Colloredo also instituted numerous church reforms, many intended to make the liturgy more comprehensible. These included the abolition of some popular local traditions, such as the firing of cannons and the carrying of pictures and statues during church processions as well as the famous pilgrimage to Pinzgau; a shortening of the Mass (described by Mozart in a letter to Padre Martini of 4 September 1776); and the replacement of purely instrumental pieces traditionally performed at the gradual with choral compositions based on liturgical texts, as well as the replacement of Latin hymns sung in German. Impoverished as the church music may have become, it is thanks to these changes that Michael Haydn composed more than 100 offertories and graduals and later published his Heiliger Gesang. The reforms, spelt out in detail in Colloredo's pastoral letter of 1782, were not popular; congregations passively resisted the introduction of German hymns by not singing them and worshippers in parishes near the border frequently attended services in Bavarian churches, where instruments were still allowed.

Private music-making was an important part of Salzburg's musical life: several of Leopold and Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart's works were composed for the local nobility, including the divertimentos K247 and K334, as well as the 'Haffner' Serenade K250; Michael Haydn's male-voice quartets were composed for his friends at St Peter. In 1778 the archbishop's nephew, Johann Rudolf, Count Czernin, founded a private orchestra that gave weekly concerts at the palace of Count Lodron; a later private orchestra, which met at the house of Dr Silvester Barisani, physician to the archbishop, gave the first Salzburg performance of Mozart's 'Linz' symphony (no.36) in September 1784. Public concerts, first mounted at the instigation of the archbishop, became more frequent in Salzburg after 1781; travelling virtuosos frequently performed there, including several (Strinasacchi, J.L. Dussek and Storace) with connections to Mozart, who by then had moved to Vienna. The repertory at these concerts was increasingly dominated by the works of non-Salzburg composers. It was not until 1797 that a local theatrical troupe was established under the direction of Lorenz Hübner, editor of the Salzburger Intelligenzblatt, and Giuseppe Tomaselli, a court tenor. Directed by Franz Joseph Otter, the troupe included in its repertory Mozart's Die Entführung aus dem Serail, Die Zauberflöte, Le nozze di Figaro and Don Giovanni (the last two in German), as well as spoken dramas by Goethe and Schiller.

In 1803 Colloredo fled Salzburg in anticipation of a French invasion; the last Kapellmeister was Luigi Gatti (from 1783). Thereafter, the spiritual princedoms of both Passau and Eichstädt briefly came under Salzburg control and musical life enjoyed a last moment of prosperity during the reign of Archduke Ferdinand of Tuscany (1803–5). The court was finally abolished in 1806, and the best local musicians transferred to the Vienna Hofmusikkapelle.

3. 19TH AND 20TH CENTURIES. When political stability was restored to Austria in 1816, Salzburg changed from an episcopal seat to a stagnant provincial town; for almost 40 years the city was without a significant musical culture. Of earlier institutions, only the Kaiserliches Königliches Nationaltheater (until 1806 the Hoftheater) survived; its repertory included Singspiele by Weigl, Dittersdorf and Wenzel Müller, as well as operas by Rossini, Cherubini, Mozart and Weber (Der Freischütz, 1825). In 1841, the Dommusikverein und Mozarteum, an institution for 'the promotion of all branches of music, but especially church music', was founded. Its first director was Alois Taux, the most important musician in mid-19th-century Salzburg. Taux was followed by Hans Schläger (1861) and Otto Bach (1868); Bruckner applied in vain for this post on both occasions. The society held its first music festival in 1842, for the unveiling of the Mozart memorial (Angermüller, 1992); the Salzburger Liedertafel was formed in 1847. A Mozart Centenary Festival was held in 1856, when Carl Mozart presented valuable Mozartiana to the Mozarteum. Much of the impetus for the developing Mozart cult came from Taux, who from 1839 served as Kapellmeister at the Nationaltheater. Other composers active during this period were Johann Schnaubeit, Carl Santner and Peter Singer. Church music, reformed during the reign of Archbishop Johannes Katschthaler (1900–14), was directed by the cathedral Kapellmeister Hermann Spies (1892–1920) and Joseph Messner (1926–69).

The Internationale Mozart-Stiftung, whose broad initial programme included supporting and encouraging musicians and music students, promoting concerts, building a library and archive and organizing periodic conventions of musicians, was founded in 1870 by Karl Freiherr von Sterneck (1813–93). In 1875 it started the first complete edition of Mozart's works; at music festivals held in 1877 and 1879, the Vienna Hofoper orchestra was conducted, respectively, by Otto Dessoff and Hans Richter. In 1880 Sterneck succeeded in freeing the Mozarteum from its administrative association with the Dommusikverein; it united with the Internationale Mozart-Stiftung to form the Internationale Stiftung Mozarteum. The first director of the public music school was Joseph Friedrich Hummel; it later became a conservatory (1914, state controlled from 1922), a Reichshochschule für Musik (1939–45), a Musikakademie (1953) and the Hochschule für Musik und Darstellende Kunst (1971). Among its outstanding directors were Bernhard Paumgartner (1917–38 and 1945–9), Clemens Krauss (1938–45) and Eberhard Preussner (1959–64). The most important composers working in Salzburg during the 20th century include Egon Kornauth, Joseph Messner, Friedrich Frischenschlager, Franz Ledwinka, Wilhelm Keller, Franz Herf, Rolf Maedel, Friedrich Neumann, Josef Maria Horvath, Andor Losonczy and Barna Kovats. In addition to the annual Salzburg Festival (see §4 below) there are other musical events in the city. For the bicentenary of Mozart's birth in 1956 the Internationale Stiftung Mozarteum initiated an annual series of concerts held at the end of January, the Salzburg Mozart Week (Salzburger Mozart-Woche). In 1967 Herbert von Karajan initiated a ten-day Easter Festival.

4. THE SALZBURG FESTIVAL. The first important predecessor of the present-day Salzburg Festival was the 1877 music festival held by the Mozart-Stiftung. Subsequent festivals under Richter (1879 and 1887, for the centenary of Don Giovanni), Jahn (1891, for Mozart's death centenary), Hofkapellmeister Joseph Hellmesberger (ii) (1901), Mottl (1904), Strauss and Mahler (1906, including a performance of Le nozze di Figaro by the Vienna Hofoper personally subsidized by Emperor Franz Joseph), Nikisch, Franz Schalk, and Weingartner (1910) led to the idea of a regular festival; one was planned for summer 1914 but was cancelled on the outbreak of war. In 1917 Friedrich Gehmacher and Heinrich Damisch founded the Salzburger Festspielhaus-Gemeinde in Vienna with a branch in Salzburg for the purpose of establishing an annual festival of drama and music with special emphasis on the works of Mozart; the first festival took place in 1920 with Max Reinhardt's production of Hofmannsthal's Jedermann in the Domplatz, since then a traditional event. Bernhard Paumgartner organized the first series of concerts at the 1921 festival; operas were first given at the 1922 festival in the small Stadttheater: Don Giovanni and Così fan tutte conducted by Strauss, and Le nozze di Figaro and Die Entführung aus dem Serail conducted by Schalk. There were no music performances at the 1923 festival, when the first official ISCM festival was held in Salzburg, and the entire 1924 festival was cancelled because of the general economic crisis.

1925 was an important year, with the opening of the Festspielhaus, the first lieder recital and the first radio broadcast of a festival event (Don Giovanni, 24 August). The Festspielhaus was rebuilt in 1926 by Clemens Holzmeister to seat 1200, first used for opera in 1927 (Fidelio) and altered in 1937 and 1939. Open-air performances have been given in the Felsenreitschule (Summer Riding School) since 1926; in the same year a contemporary opera, Strauss's Ariadne auf Naxos, was for the first time included among the festival events. During the 1930s Walter, Furtwängler, Knappertsbusch and Toscanini were the leading conductors; Herbert Graf produced many of the operas. After the Anschluss in 1938, however, many artists left or refused to perform in Salzburg, including Walter, Toscanini, Kleiber, Fritz Busch and Klemperer. Events were curtailed during World War II and the 1944 festival was cancelled.

The founding and early history of the Salzburg Festival has increasingly become a fashionable topic in cultural history; in one compelling view it is seen as a search for Austrian identity after the fall of the Habsburg monarchy, and as a conservative reaction against modernism (Steinberg, 1990). Since its resurrection in 1945 a number of premières have been given at the festival, notably Strauss's Die Liebe der Danae (1952) and Henze's The Bassarids (1966); productions of early operas have also been mounted, including Cavalieri's Rappresentatione di Anima, et di Corpo (1968). The Vienna PO has long been the musical backbone of the festival; in addition to playing for orchestral concerts, it has also served as the opera orchestra, chamber orchestra for the serenade concerts, and for the sacred concerts. The first guest orchestra to perform was the Budapest PO under Ernst von Dohnányi in 1931; the next was the Berlin PO in 1957. Among conductors, the festival has been dominated in the postwar era by Furtwängler, Böhm and Karajan, who until his death in 1989 also served as musical director. Karajan was succeeded as director in 1991 by Gérard Mortier; under his direction the festival has reintroduced the performance of classic 20th-century operas, including Schoenberg's Moses und Aron, Berg's Lulu, Bartók's Bluebeard's Castle and Janáček's From the House of the Dead.

CLIFF EISEN

Salzédo [Salzedo; Salcedo], Carlos (Léon) (b Arcachon, 6 April 1885; d Waterville, ME, 17 Aug 1961). American harpist and composer of French birth. He graduated from the Paris Conservatoire at the age of 16, an unprecedented winner of the premier prix in two instruments. In 1909 he moved to New York, where he was engaged as the first harpist of the Metropolitan Opera orchestra under Toscanini for four years. In 1913 he founded the Trio de Lutèce and in 1917 the Salzédo Harp Ensemble; he also played in and helped to found and promote other ensembles worldwide. A champion of contemporary music, he assisted Varèse in organizing the International Composers' Guild (1921) and was active in ISCM, the New Music Society of California (under the direction of Cowell), the Pan American Association of Composers and Pro-Musica. He established the harp department at the Curtis Institute of Music (1924), founded the Salzédo Harp Colony in Camden, Maine (1931), and taught at the Juilliard School. Other activities included serving as editor of the Eolian Review (later Eolus) and president of the American Harp Society. In 1931 Lyon & Healy (Chicago) began to produce the first Salzédo Model Harps.

Ernst Bloch wrote in the 1920s that Salzédo opened the door to a new concept of harp playing. Through his own compositions and those of others, he brought greater prestige to harp technique and literature than had previously existed. His compositions can be divided into early works (1910–18), the harmonic vocabulary of which recall Ravel and other Impressionists, progressive works (*c*1919–60), comprising the bulk of his output, and transcriptions and original setting of well-known melodies. Through extensive experimentation he analysed the multiple timbres a harp could produce, inventing symbols to notate new sounds and introducing terms or phrases to describe them. These began to appear in his compositions around 1919. He was also recognized as a pioneer of consistent fingering and pedal markings. The influence of his methods, timbres and techniques on other composers was widespread; in particular, Berio, Crumb, Boulez, Wen-chung and Persichetti adopted his symbols, or used similar ones. Salzédo's attention to detail, his search for uniformity and his creative inspiration initiated an open-ended school of 20th-century harp composition, performance and teaching.

Salzedo, Leonard (Lopes) (b London, 24 Sept 1921; d Leighton Buzzard, 6 May 2000). English composer of Spanish origin. He studied at the RCM (1940–44), his principal teachers being Isolde Menges (violin) and Howells (composition). His early career combined freelance composition and work as a violinist with the LPO and RPO (1947–66). In 1944 Rambert commissioned him to write the music for her ballet The Fugitive; his association with ballet was strengthened by musical directorships of the Rambert Company (1966–72), Scottish Ballet (1972–4), and London City Ballet (1982–6). His most successful score was The Witch Boy; Beecham conducted the first performance of the concert suite in 1959 in the Festival Hall, where three years previously he had introduced Salzedo's First Symphony. His Divertimento for brass became famous as the signature tune for BBC TV's Open University programmes in the 1970s.

CHRISTOPHER PALMER/MERVYN COOKE

Salzer, Felix (b Vienna, 13 June 1904; d New York, 12 Aug 1986). American musicologist of Austrian birth. He studied music history with Adler in Vienna, where he took the doctorate in 1926 with a dissertation on Schubert; at the same time he studied theory and analysis with Hans Weisse and Heinrich Schenker. He was awarded a diploma in conducting from the Vienna Music Academy in 1935. In 1937, with Oswald Jonas, he founded Der Dreiklang, a monthly journal that dealt with Schenker's theories. He emigrated to America in 1940 and taught at the Mannes College of Music (1940–56, 1962–4; executive director 1948–55). In 1963 he became professor of music at Queens College of the City University of New York.

Salzer's writings, derived from the theories of Schenker, have had considerable influence on the study of theory and analysis in the USA. He provided a succinct exposition of Schenker's ideas in the introduction (1969) to his revision of Schenker's Fünf Urlinie-Tafeln. In Structural

Hearing (1952), which organized Schenkerian analysis into a systematic course of study, he extended the application of these principles to embrace tonal music from the Middle Ages to the present. Further, he made specific distinctions between 'harmonic' and 'contrapuntal' functions of chords, and developed the concepts of tonal prolongation and tonal structure. In Counterpoint in Composition (1969, with C. Schachter), he emphasized the relationship of Fux's principles of species counterpoint to tonal music of all styles, thus extending the concepts of part-writing evolved in Schenker's later writings. Both pedagogical works are based on Schenker's Der Freie Satz and systematize the techniques of foreground and middleground levels of composition. In 1967, with William J. Mitchell, he founded the periodical The Music Forum which he edited from 1967 to 1976. It was primarily devoted to studies based on Schenker's approach.

SAUL NOVACK

Salzilli, Crescentio (b Capua, ?1580–85; d in or after 1621). Italian composer and lutenist. There is no proof that, as has sometimes been stated, he was raised in the household of the Prince of Rocca Romana, Giovanni Tommaso di Capua, but he was in the prince's service when he dedicated his first book of madrigals to him on 6 March 1607. In February 1610 he was hired as an archlute player at SS Annunziata, Naples, and he held this post until at least 1621. His madrigals are successful imitations of Gesualdo's late style, with its contrasts of slow dissonant durezze e ligature, fast, dense points of imitation, short chordal phrases in triple metre and sudden silences. Over the four books, which comprise more than 80 pieces, the madrigals become progressively longer, less chordal and more imitative, and use phrase repetition more and more. Salzilli's two extant books of three-part canzonettas are provided with guitar tablature. Most of them have three stanzas of text, normally without a refrain, and are in triple metre with abundant syncopations and hemiola.

KEITH A. LARSON

Salzman, Eric (b New York, 8 Sept 1933). American composer and writer on music. After studying composition with Morris Mawner at the New York High School of Music and Art (1949–51), he continued his studies at Columbia University (BA 1954), where his teachers included Beeson, Luening and Ussachevsky. He pursued postgraduate work at Princeton University (MFA 1956) under Babbitt, Sessions and others. A Fulbright Fellowship (1956–8) facilitated further study with Petrassi at the Accademia di St Cecilia, Rome, and with Scherchen, Stockhausen and Nono at Darmstadt. In 1958 he returned to the USA and began a career as a music critic, writing for the New York Times (1958–62), the New York Herald Tribune (1962–6) and Stereo Review (from 1966); he won the Sang Prize for Criticism in the Fine Arts in 1969. He was also active as music director of WBAI-FM, New York (1962–3, 1968–72), a non-commercial radio station, and founder of the Free Music Store, a centre for adventurous performance, Electric Ear (1967–8), New Image of Sound (1968–71) and QUOG Music Theater (1970), an ensemble of singers, dancers and instrumentalists that explored new, often improvised forms. His teaching appointments have included positions at Queens College, CUNY (1966–8), the Institute for Studies in American Music (Brooklyn, New York) and New York University (from 1982). From 1975 to 1990 he produced and directed over two dozen recordings (mainly for the Nonesuch label), several of which received Grammy nominations; these feature works by composers such as Weill, Partch and Bolcom, as well as his own music. From 1984 to 1991 he was editor of the Musical Quarterly. He served as co-founder and artistic director of the American Music Theatre Festival, Philadelphia (1982–93), before founding and directing the Music Theater/New York (from 1993).

Salzman's early instrumental compositions are somewhat Expressionistic in style, yet also show the influence of Ives and Varèse. The Suite for Violin and Piano (1953) bases its musical material on Amerindian themes. During the 1960s mixed-media and music theatre works increasingly engaged his attention. Foxes and Hedgehogs (1964–7), his first work in this genre, is a concentrated expression of his ideas on art, technology and cultural change. After its initial production in New York (1967), a radio version was broadcast widely in Europe; in 1972 the work was performed in London by the BBC SO under Boulez.

In the 1970s Salzman worked with Michael Sahl, a former Princeton classmate, on The Conjurer (1974–5). This fruitful collaboration resulted in several other compositions, including Civilization and its Discontents (1977), perhaps their best-known work, a cabaret style musical theatre piece which won the Prix Italia in 1980, Noah (1978), written while the two were in residence at the Pratt Institute, Brooklyn, and The Passion of Simple Simon (1979), written while in residence at the Hunter Center for Lifelong Learning. Salzman and Sahl codified their simple, popular musical language in Making Changes: a Practical Guide to Vernacular Harmony (New York, 1977). Among Salzman's other publications are Twentieth-Century Music: an Introduction (Englewood Cliffs, NJ, 1967, 2/1974), essays in the collection Writings About John Cage (ed. R. Kostelanetz, Ann Arbor, 1993) and The New Music Theater (Oxford, 1998). (EwenD; GroveO, J.A. Conrad, incl. further bibliography)

JAMES P. CASSARO

Sam, Sam-Ang (b Krakor, Pursat, Cambodia, 8 Jan 1950). Cambodian ethnomusicologist and performer. He had had no formal music training before he entered the Royal University of Fine Arts in Phnom Penh at the age of 13, graduating with a Diplôme des Arts in 1970 and a Baccalauréat des Arts in 1973. Although he began to study music composition and ethnomusicology in 1974 at the University of the Philippines, the latter field under Ramon Santos and José Maceda, he earned both BA and MA degrees in Composition at Connecticut College, under Chinary Ung among others. After earning the PhD in Ethnomusicology at Wesleyan University in 1991, he taught at the University of Washington, was director of the Cambodian Network Council in Washington, DC, and in 1994 received a five-year McArthur Fellowship which supported his teaching post at Phnom Penh's restored Royal University of Fine Arts. In 1998 he was awarded a National Heritage Award by the National Endowment for the Arts.

Besides being an ethnomusicologist specializing in the music of his native Cambodia, Sam is an active performer of Cambodian classical music; his major instruments are the khloy (bamboo flute) and sralai (quadruple-reed oboe). With his wife, dancer Chan Moly Sam, he has written numerous articles and books and produced both videotapes and audio recordings, many with pedagogical purposes. Although he is an active performer and lecturer, he has also worked diligently to encourage other Cambodian musicians and dancers in the USA both to perform and transmit their arts to the younger generation; to these ends he has received numerous grants and awards.

TERRY E. MILLER

Samama, Leo(nard Guillaume) (b Apeldoorn, 25 March 1951). Dutch composer and musicologist. He studied at the University of Utrecht and took private composition lessons with Escher. He taught music history and aesthetics at the Utrecht Conservatory (1977–88) and at the University (1988–92). He was on the board of the Royal Concertgebouw Orchestra (1988–94) and in 1994 was appointed artistic coordinator of the Hague Residentie-Orkest. Apart from his work as a professional teacher and artistic adviser, Samama is a prolific composer and writer about contemporary Dutch music. His book Zeventig jaar Nederlandse muziek, 1915–1985 is an extensive reference manual about Dutch music in the 20th century.

As a composer Samama is intuitive and receptive to music of all periods. His current style ranges from repetitive and transformative chain forms in the Overture to a Serenade (1998), written as a prelude to his arrangement for wind ensemble of Brahms's First Serenade, to a sensual tonality in the Clarinet Quintet (1998), written for the 50th anniversary of the State of Israel. Samama has developed a personal polyphonic style showing traces of minimal music and Stravinsky-like ostinato patterns.

Saman [Samand, Samane, Sament], René (fl 1610–31). French composer and lutenist. A musician to Louis XIII, he also taught boys of the royal chapel. Several courantes by him are included in 17th-century collections of lute music. Of the three in Robert Dowland's Varietie of Lute-Lessons (RISM 1610[23]/R) one is also found in Robert Ballard (ii)'s Premier livre de luth (Paris, 1611; ed. in CM, 1963, 2/1976), another in his Diverses piesces mises sur le luth (Paris, 1614; ed. in CM, 1963, 2/1976) and the third among eight courantes by Saman in Lord Herbert of Cherbury's manuscript lutebook (*c*1640, GB-Cfm). A courante by him is also included in Besard's Vesontini novus partus (RISM 1617[26]).

Sam and Dave. American soul vocal duo. It was formed in Miami in 1961 by Sam(uel David) Moore (b 1935) and Dave (David) Prater (1937–88). Both had experience as gospel singers – Prater as lead singer of the Sensational Hummingbirds and Moore as a member of the Gales and the Melionaires. Moore had also recorded doo wop with the Majestics in 1954. In the early 1960s they recorded seven unsuccessful singles, five of them for Roulette Records, before they were signed to Atlantic in 1965. Atlantic co-owner Jerry Wexler made an unusual arrangement with the group, assigning them to Stax Records which was distributed by Atlantic.

Their commercial success between 1966 and 1969, with 12 of their singles reaching the American pop and rhythm and blues charts, owed much to the writing and producing partnership of Isaac Hayes and David Porter at Stax. Such songs as Hold on! I'm a-coming, Soul Man, When something is wrong with my baby and Soul Sister, Brown Sugar epitomize soul as a gospel-based secular music. The most dramatic example of this was their first hit, You don't know like I know (Stax, 1966), which was based on the traditional church song You don't know like I know what the Lord has done for me. Their gospel roots combined with a strong sense of showmanship to make Sam and Dave one of the most exciting live acts in soul music. Many of their Stax recordings have been covered by white rock artists, for example the Blues Brothers' Soul Man (1978) and ZZ Top's 1980 cover of I thank you.

Although Sam and Dave continued to record sporadically in the 1970s for United Artists, the UK-based Contempo label and Gusto records, after their separation from Stax, and Hayes and Porter, they achieved no success of note. Their final performance together was on 31 December 1981. Prater died in a car accident in 1988 while Moore continued to perform as a solo artist in the late 1990s.

Samara. City in Russia on the Volga. Between 1935 and 1991 it was known as Kuybïshev. The earliest documentary evidence of musical life in Samara dates from the middle of the 19th century. Amateur music-making and visits by famous performers (including Skryabin and Chaliapin) paved the way for the development of professional musical life in the area. In 1902 a Samara branch of the Imperatorskoye Russkoye Muzïkal'noye Obstchestvo (Imperial Russian Music Society) was opened, and a music college was founded in 1911. By the 1990s there were three colleges of music in the region – in Samara itself, in Tolyatti and in Sïzran'; in 1991 a department of musical performance was opened at the Akademiya Kul'turï i Iskusstv (Academy of Culture and Arts). Other musical institutions founded in Samara in the 20th century include the Akademicheskiy Teatr Operï i Baleta (founded as the Srednevolzhskaya Krayevaya Opera (Central Volga Regional Opera) in 1931), the Filarmonia (1940), the Ansambl' Pesni i Plyaski Privolzhskogo Voyennogo Okruga (Volga Military District Ensemble of Song and Dance, 1939) and the Gosudarstvennïy Volzhskiy Narodnïy Khor (Volga State People's Choir, 1952).

At the beginning of World War II the Bol'shoy company and a number of celebrated soloists – including Gilels and Oistrakh – were evacuated to Kuybïshev, and frequently performed there. Shostakovich lived in the city from 1941 to 1943; here he completed his Seventh Symphony (which received its première in Kuybïshev on 5 March 1942) and composed, among other works, the Second Piano Sonata. Other major premières in the city include Shebalin's Ukroshcheniye stroptivoy ('The Taming of the Shrew', 1957) and works by Knipper and Slonimsky.

A branch of the Union of Soviet Composers was opened in Kuybïshev on Shostakovich's initiative in December 1941. Presidents of the Kuybïshev/Samara branch of the union have included Shostakovich; the composer, pianist and teacher S.O. Orlov (1879–1953); A.A. Ėykhenval'd (1875–1952); A.V. Fere (1903–71), a composer, pianist and musicologist who founded a school of musicology in the city, and, since 1989, A.N. Berdyugin (b 1950), whose works include orchestral, chamber and electronic music.

The Kabalevsky Competition for Young Pianists of the Volga Region has been held in Samara since 1962. Jazz festivals and all-Russian folk festivals are also regularly held in the city. The traditional Grushinsky Festival of amateur singing, held annually on the banks of the Volga, attracts 150,000 guests and participants from a number of countries. The amateur orchestra of folk instruments conducted by A.I. Allo (1895–1969) was nationally famous from the 1920s to the 1960s. Today many amateur groups and student ensembles from Samara perform in Russia and abroad.

Samaras [Samara], Spyridon [Spyros, Spiro] (Filiskos) (b Corfu, 17/29 Nov 1861; d Athens, 25 March/17 April 1917). Greek composer. He studied in Corfu reportedly with Xyndas, at the Athens Conservatory (probably 1875–82) with Federico Bolognini, Angelo Mascheroni and especially Enrico Stancampiano, and at the Paris Conservatoire (from 1882), where he was highly praised by Massenet and his teachers, who included Delibes, Théodore Dubois, and allegedly Gounod. Despite early success in Paris, in 1885 he shifted his activities to Italy. 1886 saw the successful première of his Flora mirabilis in Milan and in 1888 Medgé, translated by Fontana, a lifelong admirer of Samaras, was impressively staged at the Teatro Costanzi, Rome, with Calvé in the title role. Samaras was closely associated with the Milanese publisher Edoardo Sonzogno, whose Teatro Lirico Internazionale opened on 22 September 1894 with Samaras's La martire. His three last operas were on texts by Paul Milliet, Storia d'amore or La biondinetta (1903), Mademoiselle de Belle-Isle (1905) and Rhea (1908). Carefully handling his career abroad – his operas were also staged in Paris, Monte Carlo, Cologne, Berlin, Vienna, Malta, Bucharest, Constantinople, Smyrna, Alexandria and Cairo – Samaras never severed his links with Greece, where he was idolized by the press and where he returned in 1911. (His final opera, Tigra, which was unfinished, dates from this time.) Samaras was supported by the press and, at least initially by royalty to succeed Georgios Nazos as director of the Athens Conservatory, but the increasing pro-German cultural infiltration, strengthened by Kalomiris's campaign for a 'National School' (in effect a polemic against Samaras and other composers whose music was criticized as 'Italianate'), prevented Greek musicians educated in Italy attaining such positions of influence. Samaras later earned his living by composing operettas to librettos that served national propaganda.

Samaras, the most internationally lauded Greek composer before Mitropoulos, is a remarkable figure of late 19th-century opera and an important herald of the style of Puccini (whom he knew, and with whom he shared librettists). Samaras was endowed with an instinct for stage timing, psychological characterization and melodic invention, and his refined, dramatically functional orchestration, almost anticipates Mahler in Storia d'amore, Richard Strauss in Rhea and even the neo-classicism of Prokofiev in Mademoiselle de Belle-Isle. Medgé already reveals basic features of Samaras's technique: the structuring of individual numbers, early verismo characterization and a timid approach to leitmotif. Number structure becomes more flexible in two of Samaras's triumphs: Flora mirabilis (1886), anticipating, as a libretto, Turandot, and La martire (1894). In Flora systematic use of leitmotifs is combined with an elegant structure in numbers of uneven length. The loss, during the bombing of Casa Sonzogno in 1943, of Medgé and Flora (full scores), Lionella and Furia domata (both not well received) has destroyed substantial clues to Samaras's development.

Storia d'amore, Mademoiselle de Belle-Isle and Rhea represent Samaras's maturity. Set against the 1797 conflict between Venice and Bonaparte, Storia d'amore is a psycho-analytical drama almost clinically describing Andrea's Oedipus complex, 12 years before Freud's Vorlesungen. Expanded leitmotifs alternate with cantilenas of Venetian flavour, and the musical evocation of the city's pageantry is vividly contrasted with climaxes of individual or collective drama. Mademoiselle de Belle-Isle is a drama set in the French royal court of 1726. The relationship between the scenery and individual passions is remarkably subtle. Well-versed in 18th-century French music and Impressionism, Samaras alternated Boucher- or Fragonard-like miniatures with Mediterranean passion. Rhea, Samaras's most ambitious achievement, is a love drama on Chios Island about 1400. Blending melodic verve with remarkably advanced harmonies and tone-colours, it represents a dramatically overpowering statement. An array of leitmotifs on augmented fifth chords and whole-tone scales sets Guarca apart from the other characters. Tigra, whose subject is an exotic queen rejected by her lover in 14th-century Venice, is inexplicably unfinished. Simoni's exquisite libretto leads to extremes of explosive violence in the (Christian) division between romantic love and pagan sensuousness. Evocative recitatives and elusive leitmotifs, over a sombre flow of sound, culminate in Tigra's humiliation, before a fanatical mob, for refusing to kneel before a religious procession. The disappointing librettos of Samaras's operettas discourage their revival, although the music is elegantly tuneful and subtly harmonized.

Samaras's songs are small masterpieces in strophic or ternary form. The texts include subtle melodic inflections which are elusively Greek, captivating a wide public in their recordings by Greek operatic celebrities. The transparent piano works reveal a precocious sense of pianistic sonorities, representing a landmark in 19th-century Greek piano repertory. If considered as a continuation of the work of other Ionian composers such as Liveralis and Carrer, a substantial part of Samaras's oeuvre attests to the existence of a Greek national school long before Kalomiris.

GEORGE LEOTSAKOS

Samaritan music. The tradition of sacred vocal (synagogue) music of the Samaritans, a religious community (which in 1999 numbered about 640), living in Nablus (Shechem) and Holon near Tel-Aviv. They claim descent from the ancient Israelites, and their music and the manner of its performance have many apparently archaic features. The Samaritans differ from the Jews in a number of ways, recognizing only the Pentateuch as canonical (and no other books of the Bible) and regarding Mt Gerizim (near Nablus) rather than Jerusalem as the supreme holy place (see John iv.20).

Samaritan music is an oral tradition sung at synagogue services and at other religious and social gatherings. It consists of performances of literary texts (the Pentateuch and prayers in Hebrew, and hymns in Samaritan Aramaic) and is sung only by men. Although old manuscripts contain Samaritan biblical accents for guiding the reading of the texts, these are no longer used today. Samaritan music can be divided into three categories: songs sung by the whole community; those sung by both a soloist and the community; and solo songs. The group songs are more syllabic in style and rhythmically repetitious, and have fewer glissandos and tremolos than solo music. They are sometimes sung in unison, but mostly antiphonally, the worshippers being divided into two groups, one on the right-hand side of the synagogue facing Mt Gerizim, the other on the left; the former group is termed the 'right' or 'upper' group, the latter the 'left' or 'lower' group. Alternate groups of verses drawn from the Pentateuch (called 'Qataf'), or important hymns (in Samaritan Aramaic) are taken by the two groups, beginning with the 'right' group together with the priests; each group begins as the other reaches approximately the midpoint of its verses, so that there is an almost continuous bitextual performance. All the group songs are characterized by improvised parallel polyphony, in which all the intervals are at times found, and in which there are also usually drones and notes of indefinite pitch (ex.1; see also the similar improvised polyphony resembling parallel organum to be found in SYRIAN CHURCH MUSIC). Among the group songs, the Pentateuch canticles (the Song of the Sea, Exodus xv.1–21, performed five times a year at the presentation of the holy scroll in the synagogue; see ex.1, and the Song of Moses, Deuteronomy xxxi.30–xxxii.43) are particularly popular, with different melodies and styles of performance for different occasions; the singing is led by the priest-cantor.

Solo songs are usually free, melismatic recitatives, characterized by prominent glissandos and tremolo on or between certain notes. Almost all songs make use of some kind of metrical structure (especially at the end of phrases) coupled by non-lexical syllables. Solo songs are sung by the priest-cantor, or, in the case of certain hymns, by a mashira (expert in music).

Many Samaritan prayer melodies do not exceed three notes; the melodies comprise short phrases repeated over and over again or combined in pairs of half-verses in the manner of the parallelismus membrorum of the psalms. Some aspects of the style of the music sung outside services suggests a relationship to Arab folksong; others, such as the organal polyphony and the extensive use of nonsense syllables (see ex.1; see also the Byzantine TERETISMATA), may be archaic survivals. Grove, who visited Nablus in 1861, thought Samaritan music archaic, and Lachmann went so far as to ascribe to the Samaritans the greatest antiquity of any liturgical tradition (1974, p.55). The extreme conservatism of leading Samaritans may support this hypothesis.

Ex.1 Beginning of the central section of the Song of the Sea (Exodus xv. 12–16), performed five times each year at the presentation of the holy scroll in the synagogue, as recorded by the Israel Broadcasting Authority (*c*1952, at Holon): nonsense syllables appear in parentheses; transcr. A. Herzog

AVIGDOR HERZOG

Samazeuilh, Gustave (Marie Victor Fernand) (b Bordeaux, 2 June 1877; d Paris, 4 Aug 1967). French composer and critic. He knew Ravel from childhood and they remained friends until Ravel's death (1937). Debussy, however, was a greater musical influence. They met in 1896 when Samazeuilh was 19. The following year he studied the Prélude à l'après-midi d'un faune with Debussy and became his propagandist. He attended the first 12 performances of Pélleas et Mélisande, and declared 'I was, I am, a Debussyist, as I am a Wagnerian'. In Paris, he studied with d'Indy at the Schola Cantorum, then briefly with Chausson. Chausson introduced him, in 1897, to Dukas, whose disciple and friend Samazeuilh became. During his years of study, he made several visits to Germany (1894, 1897, 1898). It was at Bayreuth that he met Richard Strauss.

He wrote monographs on Dukas and Chausson, and wrote the preface to the musical writings of Dukas. As a critic, he wrote for Le temps, Sud Quest, Le courrier musical, La revue musicale, La revue des deux mondes, and worked for Radio France. He published many articles on composers such as Fauré, Bachelet, Roussel, Bordes, Ravel and Strauss, and was among the first critics to champion Messiaen's early works. An excellent pianist, he made over 100 piano transcriptions of orchestral works by Debussy, d'Indy, Dukas, Fauré, Franck, Ravel and others.

As a composer, his work spans the first half of the 20th century. He wrote mainly chamber music (his first string quartet was dedicated to Dukas) but also orchestral works.

BRIGITTE MASSIN

Samba. An Afro-Brazilian couple-dance and popular musical form. Originally 'samba' was a generic term designating, along with batuque, the choreography of certain circle-dances imported to America from Angola and the Congo. A characteristic element of the folk samba is the umbigada, an 'invitation to the dance' manifested by the touching of the couple's navels. Singing always accompanies the dancing. Melodic contours are generally descending and melodies isometric. In the caipira (i.e. rural São Paulo) folk samba, singing is almost always in parallel 3rds. Mostly in binary metre, samba melodies and accompaniments are highly syncopated: a semiquaver–quaver–semiquaver figure is particularly characteristic. The dance gradually became urbanized by the late 19th century and urban versions differ substantially from rural folk sambas, but both feature responsorial singing between a soloist and chorus who sing alternating stanzas and refrain.

De Andrade, who studied the rural São Paulo samba in the 1930s, held that the samba was defined by its choreography rather than its musical structure. Its short texts, simpler than those of the urban forms, usually dealt with daily activities and followed the traditional seven-syllable verse pattern of Portuguese poetry, although variations of metre might occur as a result of improvisation in most texts. This variety influenced the caesura of the melodic line of the early urban sambas, in which the texts follow a strophic structure. In the rural samba the typical accompanying ensemble includes the bombo (a large bass drum), snare drum, tambourine, cuíca (friction drum), reco-reco (güiro type of scraper) and guaiá (a shaken rattle). Regional variants with slightly different choreographic organization are the southern samba de lenço and samba-roda, and the northern samba-de-roda and samba-de-matuto. Folk versions in Rio de Janeiro are the partido-alto and the pernada-carioca, the latter influenced by capoeira.

The urban samba became standardized during the 1920s, particularly in Rio de Janeiro. The first recognized samba to be recorded was Pelo telefone, by Ernesto dos Santos ('Donga') in 1917. Among the most important composers of urban sambas from 1920 to 1950 were José Barbosa da Silva ('Sinhô'), Noel Rosa, Alfredo da Rocha Viana ('Pixinguinha'), Ari Barroso, Lamartine Babo, João de Barros and Ataulfo Alves. Several species of the form appeared from the late 1920s to the mid-1940s including the samba de morro, sometimes also referred to as batucada, cultivated by people of the favelas (hillside slums) of Rio de Janeiro. Its accompaniment was performed predominantly by percussion instruments. In the 1930s the urban samba acquired the character of a sung ballroom dance, with the backing of a colourful orchestra whose percussion section was considerably reduced compared with the concurrent Carnival samba. Other forms include the samba de breque (with spoken words interjected at cadences) and the samba de enredo, created by composers associated with the samba schools for their annual Carnival parade.

The samba school (escola de samba) has been the most important carnival institution of the century. The first school, called Deixa Falar ('let them speak'), was founded in 1928. Up to that time the carnival groups, known as cordões and blocos and drawing their membership mostly from the black and mixed race populations, had difficulty obtaining permission to parade in the downtown area. The idea of a 'school' emerged not only to give the somewhat ironic impression of respectability to the groups, but mostly to institutionalize them. The two most prestigious samba schools have been Estação Primeira de Mangueira (founded in 1929) and Portela (1935), the former rather traditional and the latter innovative. Numerous other shcools appeared in subsequent decades and compete with each other in official competitions. For this purpose, the 'sambadrome' (a structure of some 700 m long that can accommodate up to 90,000 people) was inaugurated in 1984. The presentations of samba schools are judged for their music, choreography, subject of presentation (enredo) and costumes. Parades can include up to 5000 participants and their enredo must be national, historical, political or a homage to famous national figures, such as writers, composers or poets. A number of composers and vocalists associated with samba schools have enjoyed national acclaim, as in the cases of Cartola, Zé Keti, Paulinho da Viola, Ivone Lara and Martinho da Vila. The history of samba schools and their sambas represents a strong affirmation of the poor, predominantly black and mixed race population of the city of Rio de Janeiro. The impact of Afro-Brazilian musical aesthetics on the national popular culture is due in great part to the samba schools.

Samba-canção, samba-choro and samba-fox were hybrid forms whose lyrics dealt with love and unhappiness, often melodramatically; they were mainly ballroom and later night-club genres. The urban samba remained basically unchanged until the advent of BOSSANOVA in the late 1950s. Beginning in the 1980s various sub-genres of urban samba have emerged, the most significant of which have been the samba-pagode and the samba-reggae. The pagode movement was initiated in the mid 1970s by working-class people in response to the overly touristic and commercialized sambas associated with the samba schools. But by the early 1990s, a new samba, also labelled pagode, had replaced the oder version. Samba-reggae developed in the 1980s in Salvador, Bahia out of the bloco afro movement, as part of the vindication of black ethnicity. A potent symbol of black pride, Jamaican reggae was incorporated into this hybrid genre of great cultural significance.

Sambamurthy [Sambamoorthy], Pichu (b Bitragunta, Tamil Nadu, 14 Feb 1901; d Madras, 23 Oct 1973). Indian musicologist. His first musical training was with Boddu Krishniah in violin and M. Doraiswami Iyer in vocal music. He later studied with S.A. Ramaswami Iyer and Krishnaswami Bhagavatar. In 1928 he became lecturer in music at Queen Mary's College, Madras. After receiving a grant from the Deutsche Akademie, he left for Munich in 1931 to study Western music and comparative musicology at the university, and violin and flute at the Staatliche Akademie der Tonkunst. He was made lecturer (1937) and later reader in music at the new department of music at the University of Madras. After his retirement in 1961 he was director of the Sangita Vadyalaya (1961–4) before becoming professor of musicology at the Sri Venkateswara University, Tirupati (1964–6); he later returned to the University of Madras as a retired professor. He was a prolific author, particularly of educational books, and he collaborated on many projects with his wife Anandavalli. Although he was associated with Karnatak music, his musical interests were broad, and in his book South Indian Music he included a chapter on folk music (vol.iii) and comparative chapters on Western music (vol.vi). He travelled and lectured widely and was the recipient of numerous awards, including the Padma Bhushan. In 1972 he was named Sangita Kalanidhi.

MARIA LORD

Samber, Johann Baptist (b Salzburg, bap. 10 May 1654; d Salzburg, bur. 19 Sept 1717). Austrian theorist, organist and teacher. He was educated in his native city. About 1660 he entered the court chapel school, founded for children of the chapel choir. He studied music with Andreas Hofer, Kapellmeister of Salzburg Cathedral, and later also with Georg Muffat, who became court organist in 1678. In 1668 he entered Salzburg University but left before completing his studies. In 1689 he began to deputize for the infirm organist of Salzburg parish and cathedral, Hans Jacob Raiff; after Raiff's death in 1693, he succeeded him in these positions. In addition he pursued an active career as music teacher and also as instructor at the court chapel school. In his Manuductio ad organum (1704) he reported that he had taught 300 students. His three treatises document in considerable detail the musical practices of south Germany and Austria in the late Baroque period. The Manuductio ad organum and the Continuatio ad manuductionem organicam (published three years later) contain much information about the elementary fundamentals of music, solmization (richly illustrated with 71 pages of examples and explanations) and keyboard instruction, as well as a most valuable thoroughbass method. The latter partly shows the influence of his teacher Georg Muffat, and subsequently it influenced Samber's successor as cathedral organist, Matthäus Gugl, in his thoroughbass manual Fundamenta partiturae in compendio data (Salzburg, 1719). The most important section of Samber's Continuatio is entitled 'Wie man eine schöne Harmoniam oder liebliche Gesang nach gewissen Praecepten und Regel componiren'. This consists of a restatement of Christoph Bernhard's contrapuntal doctrine appearing in his Ausführlicher Bericht vom Gebrauche der Con- und Dissonantien, especially Bernhard's concept of the figurae superficiales, those exceptional dissonance procedures labelled with rhetorical terms such as superjectio, variatio, multiplicatio, ellipsis, retardatio, quasi transitus and abruptio. Equally valuable is the long description of the registers of the Salzburg Cathedral organ as well as the general comments regarding organ registration, which are particularly relevant to the traditions of organ practice in south Germany and Austria in the Baroque period. Samber's final work, Elucidatio musicae choralis (1710), is restricted to an explanation of the learning and performance of plainchant. Although his treatises were neither original nor new in outlook, they encompass a comprehensive view of music theory and performing practice in Salzburg around 1700. Together with his activities as organist and teacher they make him the major Austrian music theorist before Fux.

Sambuca (i) (Lat.; Gk. sambukē). One of several terms for the Greek harp (see TRIGŌNON). The word is Eastern in origin: there are cognates in various languages, notably Aramaic (there the word is sabbeka, which appears four times in Daniel). The term was also applied to a Roman engine of war consisting of the hull of a boat with a vertical ladder at its prow that was supported by cables. The military device was named after the musical instrument, which was considerably older, and harps closely corresponding to descriptions of the machine are found in pictorial representations. These harps had a boat-shaped soundbox as their horizontal member with a vertical post rising at one end of the soundbox and strings extending diagonally between the two members (for an illustration see MESOPOTAMIA, fig.4) The instrument was thus something of a cross between an arched harp and an angular harp; it had the lower soundbox and diagonal strings of an arched harp, but its post was attached to the soundbox at an angle so that the overall shape of the instrument resembled a triangle more than a bow.

Sambucetti, Luis (b Montevideo, 29 July 1860; d Montevideo, 7 Sept 1926). Uruguayan conductor and composer. He received early instruction in music from his father, Luis Sambucetti-Balero, and from Luis Preti and José Strigelli. From 1884 to 1888 he studied in Paris with Hubert Léonard (violin) and Théodore Dubois (composition). During that time he was appointed concertino (1886) in the orchestra of the Théâtre du Châtelet. Sambucetti returned to Montevideo in 1888 and became prominent as a conductor, particularly with the Beethoven Society orchestra (1901–2) and the National Orchestra (1908–14). He also played the violin in the Sambucetti Quartets concert series in 1891, 1900 and 1911–18. He was influential in the development of music teaching in Uruguay, as a co-founder of the Instituto Verdi (1890) and as a teacher of the violin and harmony there. The Instituto was one of the most important conservatories in Montevideo until Sambucetti's death in 1926. His compositions include orchestral, choral and chamber works, songs and piano music.

Sambucetti's brother Francisco founded and edited the periodical Montevideo musical (published 1885–1952).

Samfundet til Udgivelse af Dansk Musik. Danish music publishing society. It was founded on 18 December 1871 by Jakob Fabricius (1840–1919) as a private, noncommercial enterprise with the aim of furthering knowledge of Danish music by publishing major Danish works. The catalogue comprises over 300 works by composers of all periods, and includes Mogens Pedersøn's madrigals (*c*1620), works by late 18th-century masters such as F.L.A. Kunzen and J.A.P. Schulz, works of the 19th century by Weyse, Kuhlau, Hartmann and Gade, the music of Carl Nielsen and his successors, Riisager, Høffding, Weis, Tarp and Holmboe, and later works by N.V. Bentzon, Maegaard, M.W. Holm, H.D. Koppel, Gudmundsen-Holmgreen and Nørholm and the succeeding generation. (The society has issued detailed lists of works by Riisager and Høffding.) Works are published in their original form, mainly in full scores (and parts); for modern compositions, where necessary, traditional notation and format have been replaced by graphic notation. From the outset historical editions included informative prefatory material; facsimile editions and critical editions by leading scholars have also been produced. Series produced by the society include The Classical Accordeon Edition and The Contemporary Danish Organ. In the mid-1960s the society began issuing gramophone records of works in its catalogue. The Samfundet til Udgivelse af Dansk Musik is largely financed by subsidies from the state's cultural fund.

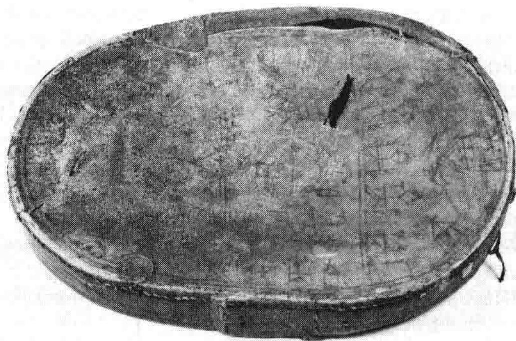
DAN FOG

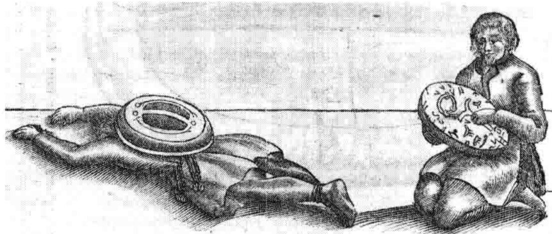
Sámi [Saami] music. The music of the Sámi people of Lapland. The inhabitants of Lapland prefer to be known as Sames or Sámi (from Samish sab'me: 'man') rather than Lapps, since the latter means people who have gone or been driven to the end (lappu or lappi) of the world and might thus be thought to refer to people who are considered rough or barbaric outcasts.

1. Historical background. 2. The current situation.



1. Historical background. The original homeland of the Sámi and the date of their migration to Finno-Scandinavia are in doubt. Modern investigations suggest that they gradually shifted the nucleus of their territory from the White Sea coast to northern Norway, under pressure from stronger peoples. The first Sámi groups probably migrated to Finno-Scandinavia in the middle of the 1st century BCE. Today the Sámi number about 20,000 in Norway, about 8000 in Sweden, about 3000 in Finland and less than 2000 in Russia. Their language is classed as Finno-Ugric.

The Sámi have for many centuries been subject to colonization and development of their territory by foreign merchants, royal officials and settlers and to conversion to Christianity by missionaries. They have always suffered from being an alien minority with a different appearance, language and culture from the rest of the population. They have lived mainly by hunting, fishing, agriculture, reindeer breeding and (until the 16th century) fur trading.



The Christian influence became stronger in the 16th century. Sámi beliefs about nature and natural phenomena were subject to particular attack. In most Sámi rituals a noaidi (shaman) participated in collective singing and drumming: these rituals, and eventually all singing, were prohibited and most shamanic drums were destroyed. Missionaries and travellers between the 17th and 19th centuries provided the first reports of juoi'gat ('singing in the Sámi way'), but gave conflicting views about it: some thought it was hideous screaming, while others described it more sympathetically. The adverse reaction was probably due to disapproval of ritual song and of its possible effect on other song.

At that time the Sámi way of life still depended on the influence and power of the shaman. Singing by both the shaman and the other participants played a central role in shaman meetings. Loud repetitive singing employing voice disguise, with accompanying gestures, must have been an essential feature. Songs played an important role in other social occasions, and the performance style of these songs and shamanic songs probably influenced one another, so that it is not easy to make a strict division between the two. For this reason, and also because according to Sámi traditions they learned to sing from the uldas (creatures who live in cliffs, woods and lakes), the missionaries' ban on all song was understandable. The influence of ritual song introduced heathen and forbidden elements into other song, besides an unusual performance style. Some early authors condemned all such singing out of hand; others took exception to some aspect of it; and a third group was unprejudiced and enjoyed it.

This ban and the harsh penalties for any infringement was successful in abolishing 'heathen' (shamanic) song completely, but it is difficult to measure its effect on other singing. Juoi'gat almost disappeared from the public scene, but it still exists, even if in schools and at public events it may not be done in 'the Sámi way'.

The musical instrument most often mentioned in the source writings is the shamanic drum, commonly of frame or shell type (fig.1). The reindeer hide stretched over the frame or shell was richly painted with symbols and a hammer-shaped piece of reindeer horn served as a drumstick. The drum was used extra-musically to produce a trance and for fortune telling (fig.2). A few examples are preserved in museums. Apart from other formerly common sound instruments such as rattles and bullroarers, there was one chief melody instrument, the fadno (idioglot oboe), made from a fresh stem of Angelica archangelica, with three to five finger-holes. This, like other melody instruments (such as the Finnish kantele, and the bark trumpet and flutes from Sweden), was probably adopted from neighbouring peoples. Ex.1 shows a typical fadno melody, collected before 1942. Although this instrument is no longer played the others are still occasionally used.

2. The current situation. Juoi'gat (mainly solo singing without instrumental accompaniment) has since the 1970s been the sole form of traditional musical expression. Newer musical styles based on traditional juoi'gat and retaining some of its features are also found. There is considerable regional variation in meaning of the words juoigos or juoigam, luotte and vuolle. In northern Norway the terms juoigos and luotte mean 'text with melody on persons, animals and things in an appropriate situation' (the word luotte is generally found only in this area); in the provinces of northern Sweden both vuolle and juoigos mean simply 'melody with or without text'. It is risky to draw conclusions from these differences of meaning, although some, such as Ruong, interpret this to mean that the main emphasis is on verbal content in the north and on melodo-rhythmic delivery in the south. But, if the different interpretations are considered together, juoi'gat may be taken to mean 'to sing in the Sámi way, with a definite melody, with or without text and on an appropriate occasion'.

The 'Sámi way' of singing relates to the vocal technique of the songs and to their structure, which is distinguished by its formal construction, melodic contours and rhythm, and by the way the texts are arranged. The peculiar Samish vocal timbre is marked by frequent use of glottal stops (the strained sound which is caused by rapidly and strongly flexing, and firmly closing, the vocal cords) and, above all, by ornamenting the melody with appoggiaturas, terminal notes and double glides (ex.2). In these double glides the initial upward glide is caused by an increase in breath pressure: a sudden relaxation follows and the pitch falls again.

A juoigos is composed from a definite sequence of two, four, six or more phrases equal in length, but melodically distinct: the melody is repeated at least once, usually three to six times, frequently with added variants. During performance an orderly system of repetition is established to build what Tirén has described as a 'chain song'. Most melodies are based on anhemitonic pentatonic modes and show a preference for disjunct movement. A small category of pentatonic melodies contains clearly emphasized and definitely sounded semitones. There is a variety of rhythmic organization. The basic beat may be divided into two or three with a variety of accentuation and the beats themselves grouped to give simple and compound forms of duple and triple metres or additive metres (see exx.3, 4 and 5).

The juoigos repertory can be grouped into four categories according to content. Songs of the first group relate to landscapes and such specific features as lakes, mountains (ex.3), rivers, forests and reindeer pastures, as well as to transient natural phenomena and impressions (the midnight sun, rainbows, the appearance of the sea). Such songs are common mainly in Sweden (in the region around Pitea and Luleå) and are comparatively rare in other regions. The second group comprises juoigos for all the animals of Lapland: animals of the water, land and air (ex.4). The third and largest group of juoigos concerns people (ex.5). The likely subjects are the singer's close relatives and friends, acquaintances and such local characters as priests, officials and merchants. A further and more recent category consists of songs about modern objects and technical achievements. What Ruong has called 'complex joiks' combine themes from different groups and are mainly epic in character. They are typical of Swedish Lapland and the Skolt Sámi in north-eastern Finland. The repertory must once have been much more extensive; but after the shaman meetings and rituals disappeared, the music focussed mainly on the three groups described above, although Tirén found 'magic songs' – including songs about supernatural creatures, sacrificial songs and incantations – surviving in the 20th century.

Ex.4 Hagá (Clangula hyemalis: long-tailed duck) (Lüderwaldt, 1976)

Syllables and particles form the basis and often the entire text of a juoigos melody. In earlier times they were thought to be magical interjections and were believed by the shaman to derive from the language of the spirits. There are many ways in which the texts could be made up from the now 'meaningless' syllables and particles. In many songs only the name of the person or animal concerned is given (exx.4 and 5). But other words or whole phrases may be woven in or a coherent syntactical text may be used.

There are two main 'appropriate occasions' for singing: work (dealing with reindeer, hunting and fishing – situations which ensure immediate contact with nature) and social activity (particularly any kind of gathering associated with the sii'da system). On these occasions the Sám not only sing old and well-known melodies, but also invent and develop new ones. The community plays an important part in disseminating songs. Where the older forms of work, such as reindeer breeding, hunting and fishing, have been replaced by other sources of income and the sii'da system has disintegrated, the juoi'gat is rare or has disappeared entirely.

Turi believed that to sing 'a definite melody with or without text' was to give meaning to a melody and to remember it (Demant). The community provides the

Ex.5 Juoigos, Mikkel P. Sara (Lüderwaldt, 1976)

'appropriate occasion', which consolidates the feeling of fellowship. For the Sámi juoi'gat also means to sing spontaneously, in order to keep their environment in mind and to know that their community is secure. Missionary bans may have outwardly eliminated shaman meetings, drums, shamans and their functions; but they have not prevented spontaneous song, nor have they erased memories or broken up communities.

Juoi'gat is predominantly a solo vocal genre without instrumental accompaniment, and is the only traditional form of musical expression among the Sámi. However, since the end of the 1960s new musical trends have built on traditional juoi'gat singing. Nils-Aslak Valkeapää of Finland influenced musical practice when he began performing juigos songs with guitar accompaniment. The subsequent extension of the range of accompanying instruments, and the reintroduction of the Sámi shamanic drum in the 1980s, made Sámi song a mixture of the traditional and the modern, while also popularizing it and bringing it into the broad spectrum of popular, film, dance and meditative musics. Today juoi'gat is an important integrating force in world music, due in part to the efforts of singer and drummer Mari Boine Persen of Norway.

ANDREAS LÜDERWALDT

Samin, Vulfran (fl 1543–59). French singer and composer. He was a chorister of the Confrérie de Notre Dame at Amiens in 1543–4. His Missa 'Sancti Spiritus' was published in Paris (RISM 1558[1]); it is a parody of Sermisy's four-voice setting of the sequence, and culminates in a six-voice canon. 16 of his chansons appeared in Parisian collections (4 in 1546[12], 3 in 1546[14], 1 in 1548[3], 4 in 1548[4], 1 in 1549[20], 1 in 1549[22], 2 in 1559[10]). They are all set for four voices, mostly homophonically with some imitation, with melodies of limited range and expression. The poems are mostly épigrammes by François I and his contemporaries. (All his works are ed. in CMM, xci, 1982.)

FRANK DOBBINS

Saminsky, Lazare (b Vale-Hotzulovo, nr Odessa, Ukraine, 8 Nov 1882; d Port Chester, NY, 30 June 1959). American composer, conductor and writer on music of Russian origin. He studied mathematics and philosophy at St Petersburg University (1906–9) and composition and conducting with Lyadov and Rimsky-Korsakov at the conservatories of St Petersburg and Moscow (1906–10). In 1908 he and some other St Petersburg Conservatory students founded the Society for Jewish Folk Music, and in 1913 he took part in the Baron de Guinzburg Ethnological Expedition to collect religious chants of the Transcaucasian Jews. He was active as a conductor in Tbilisi, Paris and London between 1915 and 1920, and in 1917–18 he directed the Tbilisi Conservatory. In 1920 he settled in New York, where he was a founder of the League of Composers (1923) and one of its directors for two decades. He was also music director of Temple Emanu-El, New York (1924–56), where he established (in 1926) and directed the annual Three Choirs Festival. The Jewish folk and liturgical music which he studied was subtly reworked and developed in his compositions, in which lyricism and Romantic expressiveness are blended with polyphonic and rhythmic ingenuity. Saminsky conducted his works frequently with major orchestras in the USA and Europe, and his articles were published internationally.

amkopf, Kjell (b Baerum, 6 April 1952). Norwegian composer and percussionist. He studied composition with Finn Mortensen at the Norges Musikkhøgskole, and extended his studies into electro-acoustic music and sonology with Werner Kaegi in Utrecht. He also studied percussion in Oslo, Århus and the USA. For many years he performed in leading Norwegian orchestras and percussion groups for contemporary music. He is now professor of percussion at the Norges Musikkhøgskole.

He has composed for a variety of ensembles and instruments, but most prominent are his works for percussion, often in combination with electronic sounds. Quite a few of these have been commissions from radio and TV, film, ballet ensembles and theatres. In his best work rhythmic vitality is mirrored by a refined and varied sound in the creation of music that is strongly expressive.

Sammarco, (Giuseppe) Mario (b Palermo, 13 Dec 1868; d Milan, 24 Jan 1930). Italian baritone. He made his début in 1888 at Palermo as Valentin. In 1894 he appeared in Naples at the S Carlo in La damnation de Faust and in 1895 at the Teatro Real, Madrid, as Thomas' Hamlet, a role he repeated in 1895–6 at La Scala, where he created Gérard in Andrea Chénier, returning there in 1902, 1905 and 1913, and singing at Buenos Aires in 1897. His Covent Garden début was in 1904 as Scarpia; he continued to appear in London until 1914, and again in 1919. He sang at the Manhattan Opera, New York (1907–10), and at Boston, Philadelphia and Chicago (1909–13). He retired from the stage in 1919. Sammarco's voice was clear but resonant, rounded and of extensive range, as his numerous recordings (1902–15) confirm. A stylish singer, he at first specialized in operas such as La favorite, Ernani, Rigoletto, Un ballo in maschera, Hamlet and La Gioconda, but his theatrical ability later led him to prefer verismo roles, particularly Tonio, Gérard, Scarpia, Rafaele (Wolf-Ferrari's I gioielli della Madonna), and the parts he created in Leoncavallo's Zazà (1900) and Franchetti's Germania (1902).

RODOLFO CELLETTI/R

Sammartini [St Martini, San Martini, San Martino, Martini, Martino], Giovanni Battista (b 1700/01; d Milan, 15 Jan 1775). Italian composer, brother of GIUSEPPE SAMMARTINI. He was a leading figure in the development of the Classical style.

1. Life. 2. Reputation. 3. Style.

1. LIFE. Sammartini was the seventh of eight children of Alexis Saint-Martin, a French oboist who emigrated to Italy, and Girolama de Federici. He was probably born in Milan, the city in which he lived all his life. Since in his death certificate he is said to have been 74, he was presumably born in 1700 or the first two weeks of 1701. His earliest musical instruction probably came from his father. In 1717 Giuseppe and G.B. Sammartini were listed as oboists at S Celso, Milan, and in 1720 the 'Sammartini brothers' were listed as oboists in the orchestra of the Regio Ducal Teatro there. Sammartini's first known composition is an aria (lost) for the oratorio La calunnia delusa, performed in 1724, to which Giuseppe and other composers also contributed. His first set of vocal works which is known (also lost) dates from 1725: five cantatas for the Fridays in Lent written for the Congregazione del SS Entierro, which met in the Jesuit church of S Fedele. Sammartini became maestro di cappella of the Congregazione in 1728 and continued in that post for most of his life; his last Lenten cantatas are dated 1773.

By 1726 Sammartini was called 'very famous' in his contract as substitute maestro di cappella of S Ambrogio (the full appointment came in 1728). Also in 1726 he composed a Christmas oratorio for S Fedele entitled Gesù bambino adorato dalli pastori. J.J. Quantz, who visited Milan that year, wrote grudgingly of the music of Sammartini and Francesco Fiorino as'not bad', though he noted that they were the leading church composers of the city. In his maturity Sammartini became the most active church composer in Milan. The almanac Milano sacro for 1761–75 lists him as the maestro di cappella of eight churches, while the almanac La galleria delle stelle for 1775 lists 11; these included the ducal chapel S Gottardo, whose director he became in 1768 (there is no evidence to support Burney's statement that he was maestro di cappella of the convent of S Maria Maddalena). An excellent organist, Sammartini was praised by Burney as having 'a way peculiar to himself of touching that instrument, which is truly masterly and pleasing'.

The 1730s saw a notable stream of symphonies, concertos, sonatas and dramatic works from Sammartini's pen, and recognition of his music outside Italy. His first opera, Memet, was performed in Lodi in 1732, and possibly in Vienna the same year. Milan heard his second opera, L'ambizione superata dalla virtù, in the Regio Ducal Teatro in 1734, with such noted singers as Vittoria Tesi and the castrato Angelo Maria Monticelli. By the early 1730s he had become the leading figure in the earliest symphonic school in Europe, which included such composers from Milan and nearby as Brioschi, Galimberti, Giulini, Lampugnani and Chiesa. From 1733 there are records of Sammartini's acting as judge in competitions for positions at the cathedral and other churches; in 1762 he sat on one such jury with Padre Martini. Apart from his teaching at the Collegio de'Nobili, where he was appointed in 1730, only two of his no doubt numerous pupils can be identified with any certainty: Count Giorgio Giulini (1716–80), a popular Milanese dilettante composer of symphonies, and Christoph Willibald Gluck, who probably studied with Sammartini from 1737 to 1741. Many of Gluck's early works were influenced by Sammartini, and Gluck borrowed movements from two Sammartini symphonies for his operas Le nozze d'Ercole e d'Ebe (1747) and La contesa de' numi (1749). Sammartini's last opera, L'Agrippina, moglie di Tiberio, was performed in the Regio Ducal Teatro in 1743, with Carestini as Tiberius.

As Milan's most famous composer, Sammartini took a leading role in the life of the city, composing and conducting music for religious and state occasions. In January 1741 he directed a mass of his own composition in S Ambrogio in memory of Cardinal Benedetto Odescalchi. In 1742 he conducted in the church of S Paolo de' Barnabiti in Vigevano, near Milan. Many other such performances took place in and near Milan. On the birth of Archduke Peter Leopold, Maria Theresa's third son, he composed a secular cantata, La gara dei geni, presented in 1747 at the Regio Ducal Teatro by the Lieutenant-governor of Austrian Lombardy, Count Gian-Luca Pallavicini. In 1749 Pallavicini organized concerts on the banks of the moat of the Castello Sforzesco, some of which Sammartini directed. Sammartini presented concerts in 1751 at both the Sforza castle and the ducal palace on the translation of the body of S Carlo Borromeo to Milan Cathedral. For Prince Joseph of Austria's birthday in 1753, Pallavicini commissioned two cantatas jointly composed by Sammartini and Niccolò Jommelli. In 1757 and 1759 Sammartini took part in feste solenne at S Celso. In 1758 he became one of the founders of a philharmonic society in Milan, reflecting the city's keen interest in orchestral music. From 1750 Sammartini sent mainly orchestral and chamber works to the Margrave Carl Friedrich of Baden-Durlach in Karlsruhe. The Margrave probably met Sammartini during his trip to Italy that year. A letter from Sammartini to the Margrave dated 23 November 1750 accompanied autographs of six flute quartets (called concertini), three of which remain among some 70 works by Sammartini (in D-KA). In 1760 Sammartini published a collection of six of his finest string trios (later issued by Leclerc as op.7), dedicating the print to Don Filippo, Duke of Parma (1721–65), one of his most important patrons. During the 1750s and 60s he came into contact with some of the leading composers of the younger generation, notably J.C. Bach, who lived in Milan from about 1755 to 1762, and Luigi Boccherini, who played in orchestras under Sammartini's direction in Pavia and Cremona for the festivities in July 1765 on the visit of the Infanta Maria Luisa, future wife of Archduke Leopold.

Sammartini is mentioned in Leopold Mozart's letters from Milan in 1770: he heard Wolfgang perform and warmly supported him when there were intrigues against his opera Mitridate, rè di Ponto. Leopold described Sammartini as a person 'whom everyone trusts'. During 1770 Sammartini also met Charles Burney, who visited Milan in July and left a valuable description of musical life in the city and performances of Sammartini's music. Burney heard a mass, a motet and an 'excellent' symphony by Sammartini. He praised the skilful composition of the orchestral portions of the mass and the beautiful adagio aria in the motet; but in the mass he criticized an 'excessive number' of fast movements and the extremely active violins. He observed that despite Sammartini's advanced age 'his fire and invention still remain in their utmost vigour'. Sammartini's circle of friends included the poet Giuseppe Parini and leading Milanese figures who were members of the Accademia dei Trasformati.

Between April and September 1773 Sammartini composed six string quintets, his last extant dated works. That Sammartini's death in January 1775 was unexpected is shown by the schedule of 24 performances in Milanese churches planned for 1775 (published in the almanac La galleria delle stelle). The death certificate, dated 17 January 1775, states that Sammartini had died two days earlier and was buried in the church of S Alessandro on the evening of 16 January. Musicians from S Fedele, Milan Cathedral and elsewhere joined in a memorial service on 18 January; the Office and Solemn Mass were sung before a great gathering of people because (as the death certificate states) he was 'a most excellent master and celebrated by a most brilliant renown'. Of Sammartini's family, all that is known is that he was married twice, first to Margherita Benna (5 June 1727; d 13 Nov 1754) and then (on 23 June 1755) to Rosalinda Acquanio (aged 17), and that his daughter, Marianna Rosa (b 11 Sept 1733), was a singer.

2. Reputation. It appears that Sammartini's music was better known outside Italy than in his native land. Many of his works were published in Paris and London, especially by Leclerc, Venier and Walsh. One of his symphonies (J-C65) was performed in Amsterdam in 1738. Most of his surviving early works are in the Blancheton collection (F-Pc), formed in Paris apparently between about 1740 and 1744. The Concert Spirituel performed a Sammartini symphony in 1751 and his complex ensemble concerto in E♭ (published by Cox in 1756) was played by La Pouplinière's orchestra. His music gained equal popularity in England. It was admired by the Duke of Cumberland, brother of George III, and there is a mention of Sammartini in Sterne's A Sentimental Journey. According to Giuseppe Carpani, an early biographer of Haydn, Sammartini's music was introduced in Vienna by Count Harrach, governor of Lombardy from 1747 to 1750. Carpani reported that the music won immediate success and was patronized by such noblemen as Counts Pálffy, Schönborn, Lobkowitz and Clam-Gallas. A sacred choral work by Sammartini was performed in the Burgtheater, Vienna, in 1756, and a 'concert de plusieurs instruments seuls' was given there on 19 and 28 February 1758. A letter from Fra Giovanni Falasca to Padre Martini, dated 30 June 1756, refers to an academy organized for 1 July at which 'Sammartini wishes him to hear the compositions he intends to send to Vienna'. Although no proof exists for Carpani's statement that Prince Esterházy commissioned two works a month from Sammartini, a 1759 inventory of the Esterházy collection lists two of his symphonies. There were performances of his music in Prague as early as 1738, and the library of the Waldstein family (formerly in Doksy, now in Prague) holds the largest of all Sammartini collections, including 33 authentic symphonies.

1. Giovanni Battista Sammartini: copy by Domenico Riccardi, 1778, of a lost portrait by an unknown artist (Civico Museo Bibliografico Musicale, Bologna)

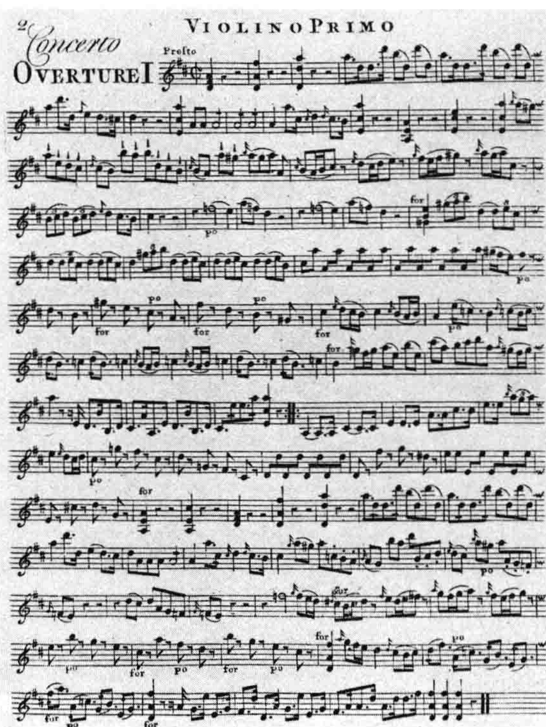
While Sammartini's influence on Gluck has long been acknowledged, his influence on J.C. Bach and Luigi Boccherini should be further investigated. Bach knew Sammartini, whom he described as a 'strong composer'. Both men participated in two academies led by Bach in about September 1760 at Casalmaggiore and Mantua in honour of the Princess of Parma. Boccherini also modelled the exposition of his string quartet op.2 no.2/i on Sammartini's 'Parma' Notturno no.4/i. Sammartini's possible influence on Haydn was first mentioned by Carpani, who recounted that the Bohemian composer Josef Mysliveček (1737–81), on hearing some symphonies by Sammartini about 1780, exclaimed: 'I have found the father of Haydn's style'. Though Haydn strongly denied any influence of Sammartini in remarks to his biographer G.A. Griesinger, a study of Sammartini's music shows a marked affinity between the composers in rhythm, structure and even in the province of musical humour. A favourite type of retransition in middle-period Sammartini symphonies (e.g. J-C4, first movement) appears also in several early Haydn symphonies.



3. STYLE. Sammartini's music falls into three style periods which reflect the major trends in music between the 1720s and the time of his death. The early period, *c*1724–39, shows a Baroque–Classical style mixture; the middle period, *c*1740–58, is early Classical, and the style most characteristic of Sammartini; the late period, *c*1759–74, points to later Classical developments. Despite these changes, certain basic characteristics can be seen in works of all periods, especially an intense rhythmic drive and continuity of structure; a remarkably varied treatment of sonata form, in which the recapitulation usually contains many changes in the order of ideas and their presentation (variants of the main secondary theme being especially common); and an unusual sensitivity to textural arrangements and contrasts, favouring non-imitative counterpoint with contrasting motifs in the two violin parts. Sammartini composed some of the earliest dated symphonies: movements from two symphonies were used in 1732 as introductions to acts 2 and 3 of the opera Memet. His symphony in G minor J-C57, whose finale Gluck borrowed for La contesa de' numi, anticipates the Sturm und Drang style by more than 20 years. Three ensemble concertos, two in E♭ (one published in 1756) and one in A, anticipate the sinfonia concertante in their scoring and two-movement arrangement. In his old age Sammartini produced some of the earliest string quartets (1763–7) and string quintets (1773), the latter scored for the unfamiliar combination of three violins, viola and bass instrument. The few surviving sacred cantatas and liturgical works show a dramatic approach to text setting and an orchestral sophistication of a kind generally associated with the Viennese school. All these examples reveal a composer who was in the vanguard of musical developments throughout his life, and an artist of the greatest integrity and seriousness.

Sammartini's early orchestral music was influenced by the north Italian concerto tradition, especially Vivaldi. The 18 early symphonies have three movements, in the succession fast–slow–fast, some with minuet finales. There is no evidence to support the oft-repeated statement that Sammartini wrote a four-movement symphony in 1734. The only extant four-movement symphony (J-C39) is undated, and the fourth movement is an appended minuet taken from a trio sonata. The symphonies are scored for string orchestra, seven being trio symphonies (most omitting the violas), an important early type. Nearly all the movements have binary division: most of the longer allegros are in sonata form; the slow movements and minuets favour simple binary designs. The movements in sonata form are characterized by well-defined key areas, themes and thematic contrasts, long developments and clear recapitulations, which almost always begin with the opening theme in the tonic key. Multithematic movements are the most common, but some early examples of Classical monothematic sonata form already appear (e.g. in J-C14, first movement, and J-C39, third movement). Though homophony predominates, several movements contain refined textural arrangements and new uses of counterpoint. Sammartini transferred to the symphony the lyrical slow movement of the concerto. He favoured the 2/4 Andante, which became the standard type of Classical slow movement. He preferred the moderate 3/4 to the fast 3/8 minuet, and also wrote long finales in 2/4 and 3/8, some of them in buffo style. The main influences in the early symphonies derive from the concerto and the trio sonata rather than the Italian overture. The symphony is already established as an independent genre in these works.

Most of the 37 middle symphonies call for two horns or trumpets as well as strings, and end with minuets, some with trio sections. There are also a few two-movement symphonies (fast–minuet). Movements become longer, harmonic rhythm slower, and almost all movements are in sonata form, including slow movements and minuets. Contrast is intensified in texture, rhythm, dynamics and mood. Many first movements have a motoric character, using themes composed of short modules, half a bar and one bar in length. Melodic continuation by literal or varied repetition and contrast replaces the frequent sequential expansion of the early style. While the development section itself is usually short, developmental interest is supplied by motivic development within themes, thematic derivations and reformulated recapitulations (which act as second developments). The slow movements, often in the minor mode, are among Sammartini's finest creations. Warmly lyrical, concise in form, full in texture and rich in harmony, they contain his most personal expression, ranging from delicate charm to profound melancholy.

In the 12 late symphonies (including eight in F-Pc dated 1768–72) there are independent oboe parts and the cello and bass are often separated. There are longer and more varied periods, a more intense lyricism (which invades even the fast movements) and more complex harmony. The texture resembles the chamber style, with frequent dialogue among all the instruments, and far greater use of imitation, especially in the slow movements. The language in these works often has a Mozartian flavour (fig.2).

2. Opening of the first violin part of a late symphony in D by G.B. Sammartini, op.4, J-C21 (London: Bremner, 1766)

Sammartini's orchestral music has a bright, transparent sound. Rhythmic effects are a prime source of interest and vitality: in the careful variation and contrast of rhythmic patterns and articulations, the deft mixture of regular and irregular phrase lengths, and the carefully calculated changes in rhythmic values. Sammartini avoided large-scale thematic repetitions, preferring understatement to the least possibility of redundancy. The frequent elision of themes and sections produces a strong continuity that is the essence of his style.

Sammartini's concertos have been studied by Ada Gehann. To the 11 authentic works must be added six others: four dating from about 1760–64 (in D-W), one from about 1755–60 (D-Rp) and a fragmentary middle-period concerto (CH-SAf, probably composed in the 1750s). 12 are for violin, two for flute and others for a variety of instruments. All but the two-movement ensemble concertos J-C73, 73.1 and 76 have the usual three movements, and all are in major keys. Most use a three- or (more often, and always in late works) four-ritornello plan, the opening ritornello being in two sections and moving to and from the dominant key (the subdominant in the early concerto J-C69). The second ritornello is in the dominant, and in the early and middle concertos may modulate to a related minor key. The third ritornello (in those movements with four) appears in the tonic after a modulatory episode which, in works written after about 1750–55, returns to the tonic by way of a retransition over a dominant pedal. Most early movements end with a return of the complete opening ritornello; later ones with a shortened (fourth) ritornello or its closing bars. A cadenza is prescribed before the final ritornello in most movements. Features of sonata form are found not only in the basic tonal layout but also in the frequent integration of the solo episodes with motifs, rhythmic figures and phrases derived from the ritornello, the quasi-developmental character of the second solo episode in some works and the recall of the opening of the movement at the beginning of the third ritornello in the tonic. The later concertos incorporate more thematic interplay between soloist(s) and orchestra. In the outer movements typical textural contrasts in the episodes come from the reduction and expansion of the accompaniment; the soloists tend to dominate in the lyrical slow movements. Two of the violin concertos (J-C77 and 70) are largely symphonic, with some solo passages. Even the earliest concertos reflect Classical trends.

More than 265 chamber and solo works constitute the bulk of Sammartini's extant music: string quintets, flute and string quartets (many omitting the viola), trios, duets, solo sonatas for flute, violin and cello, accompanied sonatas for harpsichord and violin, and keyboard sonatas. In general the chamber works are more lyrical, more ornamental and more intricate in rhythm than the orchestral music. Most are organized in two- and three-movement cycles typical of the early Classical style: slow/fast–minuet/fast; slow–fast–minuet; or fast–slow–minuet; some violin sonatas have the Baroque four-movement plan. The keyboard sonatas in one to three movements incorporate both chromatic details and virtuoso figuration. The string trios for two violins and bass form the largest and most important group, and were extremely popular, as the many surviving copies indicate. The relation between the instrumental parts (especially the violins) varies considerably from the complete domination of the first violin to frequent dialogue and imitation, none of the sonatas being consistently imitative in late Baroque fashion. Six late 'sonate notturne' dedicated to his important patron the Duke of Parma reflect the trend towards the elimination of the continuo and achieve an equality of parts within a basic homophonic texture which is close to the ideal of the mature string quartet. Sammartini's most complex chamber works – in texture, harmony, rhythm and melody – are his late solo concertinos for string quartet, his quartetti and his quintets, all in three movements. Several movements of the early 1770s are especially forward-looking, and many are marked by special features, such as the recapitulation starting in the dominant minor in the second movement of the E♭ Concertino and the imitative main theme of the third movement of Quintet no.4 (an early example of a Viennese procedure found also in the second movement of the late symphony J-C2). The slow movements of Quintets nos.1 and 4 are surely among the most beautiful of the Classical period, while the lyricism, chromaticism and varied sonorities of Quartetto no.5 invite comparison with Boccherini.

Sammartini's three operas follow the conventions of opera seria. The arias, almost exclusively in da capo form, are carefully written and often intensely expressive, especially in the operas of the 1730s. The few extant sacred works show that Sammartini was a master of the style. The more substantial works, such as the mass sections, psalm settings and Magnificat, synthesize the galant and learned styles in large-scale arias, movements in sonata form for solo and choral groups, and concluding fugues. Each of Sammartini's extant Lenten cantatas contains a one-movement overture, three arias prefaced by recitatives, and a concluding 'chorus' of the solo soprano, alto and tenor voices. The 'chorus' of Il pianto degli angeli della pace is also heard twice in the beginning, giving the work a rondo-like structure; dating from 1751, it is outstanding among his sacred output. The serious mood of these works is reflected in the use of flat keys and the many minor-key movements. Recitatives make telling use of chromatic and dissonant harmonies, especially diminished 7th chords, and the arias have great lyric beauty and dramatic power. The principal sections of the arias show the same formal ingenuity as the instrumental movements in sonata form. It is in Sammartini's religious works that many of his most dramatic and sophisticated pages are found, as well as a grandeur of effect absent from his other works.

Sammartini's music played a fundamental role in the formation of the Classical style. He was one of the most advanced and experimental composers of the early Classical period, and the first great master of the symphony, preserving his individuality despite the rise of the Viennese and Mannheim schools. Though the extent of Sammartini's influence is still not fully measured, the high quality of his music places him among the leading creative spirits of the 18th century.

Sammartini [S Martini, St Martini, San Martini, San Martino, Martini, Martino], Giuseppe [Gioseffo] (Francesco Gaspare Melchiorre Baldassare) (b Milan, 6 Jan 1695; d London, ?17–23 Nov 1750). Italian oboist and composer. He was the son of a French oboist, Alexis Saint-Martin, and the elder brother of the composer Giovanni Battista Sammartini. The report of his death (discovered by Evelyn Lance) appeared in the Whitehall Evening Post of Saturday, 24 November 1750: 'Last week died at his Royal Highness, the Prince of Wales, Signior S. Martini, Musick Master to her Royal Highness and thought to be the finest performer on the hautboy in Europe'.

Sammartini probably studied the oboe with his father, with whom he performed in an orchestra at Novara for a religious ceremony in 1711. In 1717 he and G.B. Sammartini were listed as oboists at S Celso, Milan, and in 1720 the 'Sammartini brothers' were oboists in the orchestra of the Regio Ducal Teatro there. An oboe concerto by Giuseppe was published in Amsterdam as early as about 1717, and in 1724 he contributed an aria and sinfonia for the second part of a Milanese oratorio, La calunnia delusa. J.J. Quantz, who visited Milan in 1726, regarded Sammartini as the only good wind player in the opera orchestra; when he went to Venice he ranked him with the violinists Vivaldi and Madonis as the outstanding players he had heard.

Sammartini left Italy for Brussels and then for London, where his collection of 12 trio sonatas, published by Walsh & Hare, had been announced on 30 September 1727. He was witness to his sister Maddalena's marriage in Milan on 13 February 1728, and on 13 July 1728 he was granted a passport to travel to Brussels with his pupil Gaetano Parenti. Burney erronously mentioned that Giuseppe's first appearance in England occurred at a benefit for 'signor Piero' at the Little Theatre in the Haymarket on 4 April 1723. The first reference to Giuseppe in England appears in London advertisements for a concert at Hickford's Room on 21 May 1729, which also featured 'several pieces on the hautboy by the famous Sig. St. Martini of Milan, just arrived from the Court of Brussels' (Lasocki, 887). Sammartini remained in London for the rest of his life, quickly winning recognition as a brilliant performer. He performed at Lincoln's Inn Fields on 13 May 1730. In the same year he played for Maurice Greene at Cambridge when Greene obtained the MusD degree, and also gave a successful benefit concert there. Sammartini took part in concerts at Hickford's Room on 20 March 1732 (benefit concert) and 20 April 1733, and in the Castle concerts, and he played in the opera orchestra at the King's Theatre. Burney mentioned an aria sung by Farinelli in Porpora's Polifemo (1735) that was 'accompanied on the hautbois by the celebrated San Martini'. Though Hawkins said that Sammartini was at first allied with Bononcini, he also played in Handel's orchestra. Dean pointed out that Sammartini's name is attached to many oboe solos in Handel's opera autographs, such as the difficult obbligato for the aria 'Quella fiamme' in Arminio, Act 2 (1737). On 14 March 1741 Sammartini performed an oboe concerto at a benefit performance of Handel's Parnasso in festa at the Haymarket Theatre. Giuseppe probably also played the flute and recorder; he composed numerous works for these instruments and such doublings were standard for orchestra players of that time.

Entries in the household accounts of Frederick, Prince of Wales, and his wife Augusta show that Sammartini became the music master of Augusta and her children in 1736, remaining in this post until his death, as noted in the obituary. Sammartini dedicated his 12 sonatas op.1 (1736) to Frederick, and his 12 trios op.3 (1743) to Augusta. A set of three ballets exists, with an overture ascribed to Frederick, that Sammartini wrote for the birthday of Frederick's daughter, Lady Augusta. Fiske suggested that the masque The Judgment of Paris performed at Cliveden for Lady Augusta's third birthday in 1740 was actually composed by Sammartini, not Arne, who also wrote a masque to the same text. Hawkins further mentioned a 'musical solemnity' by Sammartini that was publicly performed in the chapel of the Bavarian minister.

While Sammartini's chamber music was extremely popular (his op.1, especially, was often reprinted), his orchestral music apparently became well known only after his death. Most of the concertos and overtures were published posthumously, becoming so popular that they regularly appeared on the programmes of the Concert of Ancient Music well into the 19th century. Between 1776 and 1790 his concertos and overtures were performed there more frequently that works by any other Italian composer, including Corelli. Some of Sammartini's marches and minuets were performed for the king's birthday as late as 1770–75. Hawkins praised Sammartini as the 'greatest [oboist] that the world had ever known', possessing a remarkable tone that approached the quality of the human voice. He transformed oboe playing in England, and his pupils included the fine English oboist Thomas Vincent. The letters of administration pertaining to Sammartini's estate show that he died a bachelor, leaving his estate to his brother G.B. Sammartini.

Sammartini was primarily an instrumental composer, and one of the leading writers of concertos and sonatas in England between 1730 and 1750. His printed collections include 24 sonatas for flute and bass, 30 trios for flutes or violins, 24 concerti grossi, four keyboard concertos, an oboe concerto, 16 overtures, and some flute duets and cello sonatas. The tuneful Recorder Concerto in F, found in only one source (S-Skma), has become his best-known work. Hawkins classed Sammartini's instrumental music with that of Corelli and Geminiani. Though his music is rooted in the late Baroque style, it also reflects some later trends. There is considerable variety in the number, succession and type of movements. Most of the solo sonatas are in the more modern three-movement layout, sometimes beginning with a slow movement (which Sammartini generally preferred); trios and orchestral works often contain four or five movements, including French overtures, fugal second movements, and transitional slow movements. Sammartini's concerti grossi are scored for strings, and call for a concertino of either two violins and cello or string quartet. The concertino usually shares and elaborates material of the tutti. Op.8, nos. 4–6 are actually oboe and violin concertos; nos.4 and 5 have unique designs featuring da capo repeats and arch form respectively. The concerto style also greatly influenced the trio sonatas op.3. The four concertos for harpsichord or organ are among the earliest keyboard concertos written in England. Some movements contain advanced traits such as initial binary ritornellos and binary layouts. Many binary fast movements, even in the 1727 collection, have early sonata form designs. Other more Classical features include frequent minuet and rondo finales, fast 2/4 movements, galant embellishments, syncopated figures and passages in slow harmonic rhythm. Sammartini was a skilled contrapuntist, a fine harmonist with chromatic leanings and a good melodist, the broad lyricism of his slow movements and minuets showing the influence of Handel. His forms are interesting and well organized. Burney and Hawkins much admired Sammartini's music, which Burney praised as being 'full of science, originality, and fire'.

Sammartini, Pietro. See SANMARTINI, PIETRO.

Sammons, Albert (Edward) (b London, 23 Feb 1886; d Southdean, Sussex, 24 Aug 1957). English violinist and composer. Apart from a few lessons from his father and others, he was self-taught. He began playing professionally at the age of 11 and led the Earl's Court Exhibition Orchestra when only 13. He made his solo début playing the Mendelssohn concerto in Harrogate in 1906. In 1908 Beecham heard him playing the same concerto at the Waldorf Hotel and asked him to join the Beecham Orchestra, where he remained for five years, taking part in over 50 operas and ballets. He was leader of the Philharmonic Society Orchestra from 1913 and the orchestra of Diaghilev's Ballets Russes from 1911, touring with the latter under Monteux in spring 1913. His career as a soloist of national repute began in November 1914 when he replaced Kreisler at short notice in a performance of Elgar's Violin Concerto. He was the original leader of the London String Quartet (1907–19) and took part in the première of Elgar's Piano Quintet in London, in 1919. Sammons appeared as a soloist with leading British orchestras and formed a partnership with the pianist William Murdoch which lasted 25 years; they introduced many new violin sonatas by British composers, notably Ireland's Second Sonata in March 1917. Sammons was the dedicatee of Delius's concerto and edited its violin part and that of Delius's Sonata no.2. His complete technical mastery, characteristically large sound and sustained singing tone allied to a tough yet sensitive temperament made him Elgar's ideal interpreter of his Violin Concerto, of which he made the first complete recording with Wood in 1929, as well as often performing it under Elgar's direction.

Although his prowess as a soloist was acknowledged by such virtuosos as Kreisler, Szigeti and Heifetz, Sammons seems to have built his reputation solely on performances in England. He composed (notably a Phantasy Quartet for strings which won the Cobbett Prize), was a professor at the RCM, and was made a CBE in 1944. From 1946 his career was hampered and finally terminated by Parkinson's disease, and it was only with difficulty that he attended his benefit concert at the Royal Albert Hall in December 1954. Considered by many to be the outstanding English violinist of his generation, he also had a modest, friendly and humorous personality.

He graduated from the Tbilisi Conservatory as a cellist in 1906, and worked as a cellist with various symphony orchestras for a number of years. From 1917 to 1919 he was a conductor at the Mariinsky Theatre, Petrograd. He was artistic director of the Malïy Theatre, Leningrad (1918–36), of the Bol'shoy Theatre (1936–43), and of the Stanislavsky-Nemirovich-Danchenko Music Theatre, Moscow (1943–50). From 1953 to 1957 he was principal conductor of the Moscow Philharmonia SO and of the All-Union Radio SO. From 1929 to 1936 he taught the orchestra class at the Leningrad Conservatory, where he was made a professor in 1934.

Samosud played a distinguished role as artistic director at the Malïy and Bol'shoy theatres, where his broad artistic perspective, inventiveness and organizational ability were given free rein. He championed many new operas by Soviet composers, confirming the Malïy as the 'laboratory of Soviet opera'. He was responsible for the premières there of Shostakovich's The Nose in 1930, Dzerzhinsky's Quiet Flows the Don in 1935, and the first eight scenes of Prokofiev's War and Peace in 1946. At the Bol'shoy Theatre in 1937 he conducted the première of Dzerzhinsky's Virgin Soil Upturned, and the original (1947) and revised (1951) versions of Kabalevsky's The Family of Taras held at the Stanislavsky-Nemirovich-Danchenko Music Theatre. He was also an outstanding symphonic conductor and conducted the première of Prokofiev's Symphony no.7 (1952) in Moscow.

Samper(e i Marquès), Baltasar (b Palma de Mallorca, 3 May 1888; d Mexico City, 18 Feb 1966). Mexican composer and musicologist of Mallorcan birth. His father Joaquim was an opera singer. He began his musical education in Palma de Mallorca, but in 1907 he moved to Barcelona, where he studied piano with Granados and harmony and composition with Pedrell, who also instilled in him a passion for folklore. In Barcelona he was active as a pianist, composer and critic, and undertook research for the Obra del cançoner popular de Catalunya, a compilation of the folksongs of Catalonia. He was a founder member of the Grup dels Vuit (Group of Eight), consisting of composers who adopted a blend of French modernism and autochthonous Catalan elements.

After the Spanish Civil War ended in 1939, Samper sought refuge in France, where he was the organist of Toulouse Cathedral, before settling in Mexico in 1942. In that year he became a Mexican citizen. He taught at the National Conservatory in Mexico City, composed film music, conducted the Orfeó Català (choral ensemble of Catalan emigrés) and, as director of the Mexican Folklore Archive, undertook extensive research projects into Mexican folklore.

Samper's music presents a perfect symbiosis of the folk music of Mallorca (which he was able to investigate at first hand during his field trips for the Obra del cançoner) and the modern French musical tradition represented by Les Six. The rugged tunes, incisive rhythms, and rustic harmony come from Mallorcan folk music; but their refined formal treatment and their richness of timbre belong to the French modernist tradition.

His brother Julià was an organist at the cathedral in Mallorca.

ANTONI PIZÀ

Sampion. See CHAMPION family.

Sampler [sound sampler] (Fr. échantilloneur; It. campionatore). An electronic musical instrument which has no sound of its own, but whose sounds are entirely derived from recordings. The term is borrowed from the technique of analysis that forms part of a digital recording process, in which sound waveforms are sampled in minute slices (typically between 40,000 and 50,000 times per second). The earliest such digital samplers were constructed during the 1970s. The term has recently been additionally applied to earlier analogue instruments based on any form of recording mechanism, of which the best-known is the magnetic-tape-based MELLOTRON; other less well-known analogue sampling instruments date from the 1930s. A digital sampler normally contains the following features for editing sections of stored samples: transposition (sometimes by means of a built-in or external keyboard), looping, reversal, insertion and removal. Since the mid-1980s self-contained 'black box' samplers without keyboards have been manufactured, often optionally linked to a microcomputer for ease of editing samples, while during the 1990s, with increased computer memory and storage capacity, this also became possible entirely within microcomputers.

From around 1980 a number of digital synthesizers began featuring sampling in addition to or instead of synthesized sounds, sometimes offering users the possibility to create or edit their own sound samples; this trend has become more common in a wide range of synthesizers and other electronic keyboard instruments, to the extent that it is no longer straightforward to distinguish between a sampler and a synthesizer, especially when an external CONTROLLER is linked to the sampler via MIDI.

Sampling. A process in which a sound is taken directly from a recorded medium and transposed onto a new recording. At first sampling was done directly from original vinyl sources, with DJs mixing records first with other records, as part of a DJ set, and then during live performances. The most famous early example was the Sugarhill Gang's Rapper's Delight, a 15-minute single which featured rapping over a reconstituted loop of Good Times by Chic: it simultaneously introduced both rap and sampling to a worldwide audience. Double D and Steinski took sampling technique further in the early 1980s, using innumerable samples and cut-ups as the basis for their own non-rap tracks. Their influence can be heard on M/A/R/R/S's UK number one hit, Pump Up the Volume, a collection of samples (done on turntables, as was still common) overlaid on a drum machine track and bassline. Sampling technology progressed in the 1980s, with the Ensoniq Mirage (the first affordable digital sampler, 1985) and the Akai S1000 (1989) present in most recording studios. The technique was later used on rock records such as Bittersweet Symphony by the Verve, which looped a pattern sampled from a string arrangement of the Rolling Stones's As Time Goes By.

WILL FULFORD-JONES

Samponi, Giuseppe. See ZAMPONI, GIUSEPPE.

Sampson [first name unknown] (*fl c*1516). ?English composer. Two compositions attributed to 'Mr Sampson' appear in GB-Lbl Roy.11.e.xi, dated 1516. One, a very long setting in four forces of Psallite felices, is a Latin song in honour of Henry VIII, the other a five-voice Marian antiphon: Quam pulcra es, amica mea. In his use of declamation, brief motifs treated in imitation, and general avoidance of lengthy melisma, Sampson showed much greater acquaintance with continental techniques – particularly Flemish – than any other English composer of the period.

The only plausible candidate for identification with the composer yet suggested is Richard Sampson, dean of the Chapel Royal from 1523 to 1540. There is nothing in his known biography to suggest that he was in any way a musician, but it is known that he spent the years from 1507 to 1513 studying law in Paris, Perugia and Siena, and was in Antwerp in 1511; between 1514 and 1517 he was Thomas Wolsey's vicar-general in the diocese of Tournai. If he were the composer, these long years abroad could explain the continental style of his writing. Nevertheless, his known career was that of a lawyer, and then a diplomat and trusted official of Cardinal Wolsey and Henry VIII, for whom composition can at best have been no more than a hobby. Among his later benefices were the deaneries of Lichfield, Windsor and St Paul's, and the bishoprics of Chichester (1535–40) and Lichfield (1543–54); he died in September 1554.

In all likelihood, the composer whose works arose in this English milieu must be distinguished from a continental contemporary also known only as Sampson (or Samson), several of whose works appeared in German printed collections: a song in 1549[36], a mass cycle on the same song in 1541[1] (both of them strongly retrospective collections) and four motets in 1537[1], 1538[9], 1541[2] and 1546[6].

Sams, Eric (b London, 3 May 1926). English writer on music. He studied modern languages at Cambridge and entered the civil service, becoming a Principal Officer in the Department of Employment in 1953. His musical studies are based on his interest in the relationship between music and language, both in the text settings of the Romantic song composers and in the more general field of aesthetics and inquiry into the nature of musical expression. Much of his work in the field of the lied is concerned with a close analysis of analogues between verbal meaning and musical motif; in his studies of Schumann he has carried this particularly far with his discovery of a cipher system used by the composer. Sams's interest in musical cryptography has also led him to a solution of Elgar's 'enigma'. In 1989 he wrote and presented a television film on music ciphers and their use by Brahms, Elgar, Schumann and others. A penetrating and well-informed reviewer with a witty and allusive style, he has written for the New Statesman (1976–8), and in 1977 was visiting professor at McMaster University, Hamilton, Ontario. Sams is also a noted authority on Shakespeare and his texts.

STANLEY SADIE

Samson, (Thomas) Jim [James] (b Carnlough, N. Ireland, 6 July 1946). British musicologist. He studied at Queen's University, Belfast (BMus 1969), and then at University College, Cardiff (MMus 1970, PhD 1972), principally with Arnold Whittall. He was a research fellow in humanities at the University of Leicester (1972–3), then moved to the University of Exeter, where he was successively lecturer in music (1973–86), reader in musicology (1986–92) and professor of musicology (1992–4). In 1994 he was appointed Stanley Hugh Badock Professor of Music at the University of Bristol.

Samson's main areas of study are early 20th-century music, the social history of music in east central Europe, 19th-century musical aesthetics and the piano music of Chopin and Liszt. His writings on the music of east central Europe in general and the works of Szymanowski in particular form a valuable contribution to the historiography of this area in English; he is also a leading authority on the music of Chopin. His work is based on rigorous analysis of the music but also provides shrewd insights into the social and cultural influences surrounding it.

Samson is the corresponding editor of Current Musicology and the English editor of Rocznik chopinowski and Musica jagellonica and is on the advisory board of Music Analysis. He received the honour of Order of Merit of the Polish Ministry of Culture in 1989.

Samuel, Adolphe(-Abraham) (b Liège, 11 July 1824; d Ghent, 11 Sept 1898). Belgian composer and critic. He first studied painting in Liège, then took music lessons at the conservatory and soon chose to specialize in music. In 1840 he went with his family to Brussels, where he studied at the conservatory with Michelet (piano), Girschner (organ), Bosselet (harmony) and Fétis (composition). He won the Prix de Rome with his cantata Vendetta and later continued his studies with Mendelssohn and Meyerbeer. He became a professor of harmony at the Brussels Conservatory in 1850. He met Berlioz in London in 1853, and maintained a correspondence with him. In 1865 he organized a series of popular concerts, and in 1869 established an annual music festival. He was made director of the Ghent Conservatory in 1871.

As a critic, Samuel contributed to daily newspapers and periodicals. His compositions include operas, symphonic music and sacred and secular vocal music. His seven symphonies clearly show the influence of Berlioz; the last of these, a mystic symphony entitled Christus, was written after Samuel's conversion (his family was Jewish) to Catholicism.

In 1977 he founded the Centre Acanthe in Aix-en-Provence as a complement to the festival there and was director until 1986, when it moved to Villeneuve-lès-Avignon. In the same year he also founded and became director of the Concours Rostropovich. In 1989 he was appointed vice-president of the Théâtre des Champs-Elysées, Paris, and in 1991 he established Présences, the ORTF contemporary music festival, of which he is also director. Samuel, Gerhard (b Bonn, 20 April 1924). American conductor and composer of German birth. He studied conducting with Hermann Gerhard and composition with Howard Hanson at the Eastman School, Rochester, 1941–5. Later he was a composition student of Hindemith's at Yale and worked for two summers with Koussevitzky at Tanglewood. During his tenure in Minneapolis, he was music director of the Collegium Musicum and the Minneapolis Civic Opera, and he founded and directed the Grand Marais Music Festival. He was appointed music director of the Oakland (California) SO in 1959; under his direction, it gained a national reputation for its innovative programming. While in Oakland, he served as music director of the San Francisco Ballet (1961–71), was a guest conductor at the San Francisco Opera, and founded and directed the Oakland Chamber Orchestra and the Cabrillo Music Festival (1962–6).

From 1976 to 1997 Samuel was professor of music and orchestra director at the University of Cincinnati, College-Conservatory; he also conducted the Pacific Northwest Ballet in 1983, and was music director of the Cincinnati Chamber Orchestra, 1983–91. With the College-Conservatory's Philharmonia Orchestra he gave the French première of Hans Rott's Symphony in E major (1989), and performed reconstructions of Schubert's Symphony in E major and opera Der Graf von Gleichen. Samuel's conducting combines rhythmic vitality with a well-defined sense of structure, while his style as a composer is highly expressive, reflecting both his interest in avant-garde music and the same attention to form that marks his conducting.

JAMES CHUTE

Samuel, Harold (b London, 23 May 1879; d London, 15 Jan 1937). English pianist. He entered the RCM (where he later taught) at the age of 17 to study the piano with Dannreuther and composition with Stanford. For many years he was known only as an accompanist; but the whole course of his concert career was changed when he gave a week of daily Bach recitals in London in 1921. This series marked the beginning of a widespread demand for Bach's keyboard music in its original form rather than in the then popular 19th-century arrangements, and Samuel was seldom asked to play anything but Bach in England or on his many American tours. He memorized all Bach's keyboard music, which he presented with 'extraordinary clarity, sobriety, and sense of shape' (E. Blom, Grove5), and with obvious and infectious enthusiasm. But his repertory was large and his tastes were catholic; he was a fine exponent of Brahms's concertos and an accomplished chamber music player. Samuel's few compositions include music for As You Like It (His Majesty's Theatre, 1907), a comic opera The Hon'ble Phil, songs and piano pieces.

Samuel, Léopold (b Saint-Gilles, Brussels, 5 May 1883; d Uccle, Brussels, 10 March 1975). Belgian composer. After studying the cello and theory at the Brussels Conservatory, where his principal teacher was Edgar Tinel, he went to Berlin to complete his education. In 1911 he won the Belgian Prix de Rome for his cantata Tycho-Brahé. He was inspector of state musical education from 1920 to 1945, and was elected to the Belgian Royal Academy in 1958. His music is in the tradition of Franck, although there are sometimes Impressionist details, as in the Petite suite fantasque. His operas are Wagnerian, his chamber works are charmingly written and his songs, notably Les heures de l'après-midi, give full expression to his Romantic nature.

HENRI VANHULST

Samuel, Rhian (b Aberdare, 3 Feb 1944). British composer. She studied with Andrew Byrne at the University of Reading (BA 1966, BMus 1967) and in the USA with Robert Wykes and Paul Pisk at Washington University, St Louis (MA 1970; PhD 1978, with a dissertation Tonality, Modality and Musica Ficta in the Renaissance Chanson). From 1977 to 1983 she taught at the St Louis Conservatory of Music. She returned to Britain in 1983, and to the University of Reading as lecturer (1984) and head of the music department (1993–5); in 1995 she became Reader in Music at City University, London. Her acknowledged output dates from 1978, when she won the first of a number of awards including the 1983 ASCAP/Nissim Composers Award for La belle dame sans merci. Before Dawn was given at the first concert of the New Music Orchestral Project in New York (director Jorge Mester) in 1989.

Samuel's understanding of vocal genres betokens her Welsh background as well as American influences; they come together in her direct, sympathetic settings of women's poetry (e.g. of Emily Dickinson in Lovesongs and Observations, May Sarton in The White Amaryllis, Elizabeth Bishop in The Cool Heart and Anne Stevenson in Path). Her involvement with texts in which women speak for themselves has continued with Clytemnestra and Daughters' Letters. Her instrumental writing, on the other hand, already mature in the Elegy-Symphony, is fully equal to the techniques of abstract modernism, though 12-note procedures are residual, with recent works more tonally forthright.

Her writings encompass articles on Harrison Birtwistle's Gawain, women composers (she co-edited The New Grove Dictionary of Women Composers), feminist musicology and new music.

Samuel-Holeman, Eugène (b Schaerbeck, Brussels, 3 Nov 1863; d Etterbeek, Brussels, 25 Jan 1942). Belgian composer, pianist and conductor. Son of Adolphe Samuel, he studied the piano and theory at the Ghent Conservatory, and was, from the first, deeply interested in literature and philosophy. His career as a pianist and conductor was spent principally in France. A composer of originality, he was concerned with atonality, and from 1883 he explored the technique of the whole-tone scale. The monodrama La jeune fille à la fenêtre has an economy of means and a refined novelty that bring it close to the work of Debussy and Satie. He developed an impersonal, austere style, but was nevertheless able to evoke tragic events in some of his works (for instance, the string quartet Une vie).

Samuel-Rousseau [Rousseau], Marcel (Louis Auguste) (b Paris, 18 Aug 1882; d Paris, 11 June 1955). French composer. He studied at the Paris Conservatoire, taking the Prix de Rome in 1905, and was later professor of harmony there; his other appointments included organist at St Sévérin (1919–22), artistic director of the Pathé company and director of the Opéra (1941–4). He was also president of SACEM (1935–53). His compositions, influenced by Franck and Fauré, include operas, ballets, orchestral and piano music and songs. But it is his operas, which are ambitious in scale, that are perhaps the most interesting part of his legacy. While his early work Le roi Arthur is set in Brittany, Samuel-Rousseau's later operas tend towards the exotic. In Tarass Boulba, based on the legend of a Cossack warrior, striking scenes in a cathedral employ plainsong as the background to dramatic action. Le Hulla and Kerkeb are oriental in setting; the latter takes place in a harem, with its title role a Berber dancer. His was a conservative voice, but he had a strong sense of the dramatic and was skilled at advanced chromatic harmony.

Samuelsson, Marie (b Stockholm, 15 Feb 1956). Swedish composer. She studied the piano and improvisation (Birkagården College, 1979–81) and musicology (University of Stockholm, 1982–3), after which she composed the music for nine dance productions. She has worked as a singer and pianist, sometimes in rock groups (Elegi and Zon 6). Composition studies with Daniel Börtz, Sven-David Sandström and Pär Lindgren (Musikhögskolan, Stockholm, 1988–95) sparked a spate of works for diverse ensembles, both with text and without, using acoustic and electronic sound sources. Many of these were commissions. Samuelsson is a member of the Swedish Composers' Guild and her music is widely performed in Sweden and abroad.

Her musical language is notably independent, succinct and direct. Stylistic characteristics are frenetic strumming rhythms and short, repetitive, scalic melodic phrases (Signal and Magica de Hex), sometimes in combination with playfulness (Krom). Complex melodic development and polyrhythmic processes give a feeling of depth and intensity, though not to the exclusion of a certain extrovert accessibility. Samuelsson's music paradoxically revels in the feeling of the moment while being underpinned by clear, classically balanced form. Some of her works are productions conceived in collaboration with others, and use space, lighting, choreography and objets d'art.

MARGARET MYERS

Samul Nori [Samullori]. Korean percussion group whose name (roughly meaning 'playing of four objects') was adopted for a recently developed genre of Korean traditional music. The first performance of this type of music by the original group took place in February 1978 at the Space Theatre in Seoul, when the members were Kim Duk-soo (Kim Tŏksu, changgo), Kim Yongbae (kkwaenggwari), Lee Kwang-soo (Yi Kwangsu, puk) and Choi Jong-sil (Ch'oi Chongsil, ching). After a number of personnel changes, only Kim Duk-soo (b 1952) remains from the original group. The group had enormous success in Korea and many international tours after 1982, making several recordings and collaborating with jazz, rock and orchestral musicians.

While the music of Samul Nori is largely derived from parts of traditional Korean farmers' band music (nongak or p'ungmul kut), it is played only on two drums and two gongs (rather than by a large band), is played seated on an indoor stage (instead of dancing outdoors), and has a much more developed, professionalized and virtuoso style. The music undergoes constant development and modification, the four most popular pieces being Samdo nongak karak (Farmers' music rhythms of three provinces), Samdo sŏlchanggo karak (Solo changgo rhythms of three provinces), Honam udo p'ungmul kut karak (Farmers' music rhythms of west Chŏlla province) and Honam chwado p'ungmul kut karak (Farmers' music rhythms of east Chŏlla province). Of these, the best known and most imitated is the sŏlchanggo piece, played on four changgo drums and based on solo drum dances that were formerly part of a band performance; in 1996 the piece was about 25 minutes long.

San, Herman van. See VAN SAN, HERMAN.

Sanborn, David (William) [Dave] (b Tampa, FL, 30 July 1945). American jazz and rhythm-and-blues alto saxophonist. He played the alto saxophone briefly at about the age of eight and again to strengthen his lungs while he was recovering from polio. He was strongly influenced by Hank Crawford, and he played rhythm-and-blues professionally from the age of 14, working in St Louis with the singer and electric guitarist Albert King. After studying music at Northwestern University (1963–4) and the University of Iowa (1965–7) he toured and recorded with Paul Butterfield's blues band (1967–71), the soul singer Stevie Wonder (1971–3) and the rock singer David Bowie (1974), and thereafter with other such important rock and pop artists as James Brown, Paul Simon and the Rolling Stones. He was a soloist with Gil Evans's orchestra (at intervals from 1973 to the mid-1980s) and the Brecker Brothers (1975), and from 1976 toured and recorded as a leader; his album Voyeur (*c*1980, WB) won a Grammy Award for best rhythm-and-blues instrumental in 1981. In 1990 he played in and was host of the television jam session 'Night Music'. Sanborn is a cautious soloist, whose immaculate playing shows complete control of the traditional formulas of gospel preaching and blues; his remarkable tone is full-bodied, intense and often heart wrenching. The albums Close-Up (*c*1987, Rep.) and Upfront (*c*1991, Elektra) illustrate both his characteristic solo playing and the incorporation into a jazz recording of the most sophisticated pop studio techniques by the producer Marcus Miller.

Sancan, Pierre (b Mazamet, 24 Oct 1916). French pianist and composer. After early piano studies in Morocco and Toulouse, he moved to Paris and studied with Yves Nat at the Conservatoire, where he received a premier prix in 1937. Subsequently he won premiers prix in harmony, fugue, accompaniment and composition, and studied conducting with Charles Münch and Roger Désormière. In 1943 he was awarded the Prix de Rome, and for a time was active equally as a composer and a performer. An international soloist and chamber musician, Sancan was also a professor of piano at the Paris Conservatoire (1956–85), where he became one of the leading teachers; among his students were Michel Béroff, Jean-Philippe Collard, Jean-Bernard Pommier and Jacques Rouvier. His recordings include brilliant accounts of Ravel's two concertos, conducted by Dervaux, and Beethoven's five sonatas for cello and piano, with André Navarra. Sancan's compositions, many of them published, include an opera Ondine (1962) and two ballets, a symphony for strings, two piano concertos (1955, 1963), chamber music, songs and pieces for piano.

CHARLES TIMBRELL

Sances [Sancies, Sanci, Sanes, Sanchez], Giovanni Felice (b Rome, *c*1600; d Vienna, bur. 12 Nov 1679). Italian composer and singer. The brother of Lorenzo Sances, a singer, he was a boy soprano at the Collegio Germanico in Rome (under Ottavio Catalani and Orgas) from 16 November 1609 to at least 1 April 1614, when his father Orazio withdrew him from the college and was imprisoned for breaking his contract. While at the college Giovanni Felice sang the roles of Clio and Eternità in the opera Amor pudico, produced at the Palazzo della Cancelleria in February 1614 by Cardinal Montalto. On 14 December 1618 Sances was in Padua, from where he wrote to the rector of the Collegio Germanico stating that he had been travelling in the service of a patron (unnamed). In 1633 he dedicated two volumes of cantatas to the Marquis Pio Enea degli Obizzi, who also employed him as composer of Ermiona, an 'introduction to a tournament on foot and on horse, and to a ballet', given at Padua on 11 April 1636 with Sances himself in the role of Cadmus. In the dedication to his Capricci poetici (1649) he referred to services that he had rendered to Nicolo Sagredo 'many years ago' in Venice; the suggestion that he worked for a time at S Petronio, Bologna, however, seems to be unfounded. By December 1636 he was a tenor in the chapel of the Emperor Ferdinand II, and he continued to serve at the imperial court in Vienna under Ferdinand III and Leopold I. He married Anna Ludwig on 27 March 1642, was appointed assistant Kapellmeister on 1 October 1649, and on 16 April 1669 succeeded Bertali as Kapellmeister. He held that position until his death in spite of severe illness. He was ennobled by Leopold I in 1669. During his service in Vienna he was active as a composer of sacred music, operas, sepolcri and secular chamber music.

Sances's career spans a crucial period in the development of italianate secular music; his secular works reveal a composer of great talent, and one who was in the vanguard of musical style. Only four of his published volumes of secular music survive. The works in the first, Cantade ... libro secondo of 1633 (which was issued in two parts), are among the earliest compositions to bear the designation 'cantata', and Sances was the first to apply this name to both through-composed and strophic pieces in a single publication. The cantatas of the 1633 book range from the through-composed solo recitative and arioso Risiede più che mai to strophic variations like Altre le vie (both in part i), a cantata passegiata which combines a walking bass with florid vocal writing, and Occhi, sfere vivaci (part ii), to a text by Obizzi, which is written almost entirely in a suave triple-metre bel canto style. Sances also employed the designation 'cantata' for two sets of strophic variations in his Capricci poetici of 1649. The remaining six cantatas of the 1633 book and the one included in the 1636 collection are composites of recitative and arioso sections founded on ostinato basses: Usurpator tiranno (1633, i) is the only one to employ the descending tetrachord; Misera, hor sì ch'il pianto and E così dunque, o Lillia (1633, i; both ed. in Leopold) are built over freely invented ostinatos; while Lagrimosa beltà (1633, ii) and Accenti queruli (1633, i; ed. in Leopold), together with Non sia chi mi riprendi (1636) and the two laments Presso l'onde tranquille (1633, i) and Da più profondi orrori (1636), employ the so-called chaconne bass. In addition to cantatas and arias, Sances's 1633 and 1649 books each contain two dialogue settings. Among them is one of the few monodic settings, and certainly the finest, of Guarini's Tirsi morir volea (1633, ii). The collection of 1657 reflects the taste at the imperial court for secular pieces written for larger vocal ensembles and ensembles that combine voices and violins. Sances also provided settings (now lost) for a number of texts from the Diporti del Crescente, a collection of poetry by Archduke Leopold Wilhelm, the brother of Ferdinand III.

Sances's operas for the Austrian court are similar to mid-17th-century Venetian opera. They include comic characters and are liberally endowed with short arias and duets, often in triple metre, and usually in closed musical forms with only continuo accompaniment. In both Apollo deluso and Aristomene Messenio part of the musical setting is by the Emperor Leopold I. The sepolcri, likewise written for the Habsburg court, also include collaborations between Sances and Leopold I. Musically they are dominated by recitative-aria complexes, with many short arias cast in strophic or AAB form. They also contain a number of laments, several of which employ the descending tetrachord. Sances's published sacred music dates from his years in Austria. The few-voice works display the same gift for melody exhibited in the arias and cantatas. The sacred monodies from his 1638 collections, for example, contrast recitative-like passages with triple-metre music in a modern aria style. A number of his sacred monodies employ ostinatos: Audite me (from the one-voice motets of 1638) uses both the descending tetrachord and the popular chaconne bass that Monteverdi employed in Zefiro torna. The Pianto della Madonna, a setting of the Stabat mater, includes one of the earliest examples of the descending chromatic tetrachord ostinato, and shows the same sorts of clashes, asymmetries and overlapping phrases found in Monteverdi's Lamento della ninfa. A number of sacred works include refrain designs, and the eight-voice Salmi concertati (1643) bear explicit solo/ripieno indications.

Many of Sances's sacred works were written to conform to the liturgical demands of the Habsburg court. His Salmi brevi concertati (1647) adhere to a tradition of utilitarian settings in concertato style that date back to the 1618 Salmi ... concertati of Giovanni Valentini. His cycle of introits for the Proper of the Time – a complement to Antonio Bertali's cycle for the Proper and Common of Saints – are based on abridged and simplified chant melodies and make extensive use of strict imitation. His lost mass and motet settings range from four-voice Ordinaries in a cappella style (for example the Missa Alba, listed in a catalogue of the collection of Leopold I) and motets in dialogue style, through polychoral works, to large-scale concertato settings with massive instrumental ensembles. The large-scale sacred works emphasize distinctions between the solo and ripieno parts for both singers and instrumentalists.

Sánchez de Fuentes (y Peláez), Eduardo (b Havana, 3 April 1874; d Havana, 6 Sept 1944). Cuban composer and musicologist. He began his musical training at the age of 11 at the Conservatorio Hubert de Blanck, later studying privately with Ignacio Cervantes and Carlos Anckermann. He was a founding member of the Academia Nacional de Artes y Letras (1910) and the Sociedad de Estudios Folklóricos Cubanos (1923). In 1922 he organized the first Festivals of Cuban Song in Cienfuegos and Havana. Fundamentally biassed as a music critic, for many years he refused to consider any Afro-Cuban musical genre as a valid form of national expression, suggesting instead that the rumba, son and other musics represented a 'lamentable regression' of Cuban culture (Lapique Becali, 219). In published essays through the 1930s, the author insisted that indigenous Siboney and Arawak Indians had contributed more to the development of Cuban music than African slaves and their descendants. Sánchez de Fuentes has become a symbol of the pervasive racial tensions in pre-socialist Cuba, and of the lack of tolerance by the middle classes of Afro-Cuban expression at that time. Although he was a gifted composer, his works have never been well catalogued and little information on them is available. His most famous compositions include the habanera Tú (1892), the indigenist operas Yumurí (1898) and Doreya (1918), and a number of canciones cubanas including Corazón, Vivir sin tus caricias and Mírame así. Many of the latter were recorded in 1974 to commemorate the centenary of his birth.

ROBIN MOORE

Sánchez Málaga, Carlos (b Arequipa, 8 Sept 1904; d Lima, 17 July 1995). Peruvian composer, teacher and choral conductor. After his initial musical studies in Arequipa, he began his career as a pianist and director of theatrical companies, and this took him to Chile. For several years he lived in La Paz, Bolivia, where he was appointed professor of solfège and choral singing at the National Conservatory, a position that he held for six years. On his return to Peru in 1929 he took up a similar appointment at the Lima National Conservatory, which he directed from 1943 to 1969. He was also professor of piano, and then director, of the Instituto Bach, as well as teaching in several state schools. From 1955 he was inspector of the army bands.

As a teacher, and for a long time one of the leaders of Peruvian musical life, Sánchez Málaga had considerable influence. His musical output, although small, is also quite significant. Like most Peruvian artists of his generation, he was concerned with native Indian traditions. But while other indigenous composers drew on popular pentatonic melodies, which were considered to derive from pre-Hispanic Inca music, Sánchez Málaga sought greater spontaneity in the mestizo folk traditions, particularly those of his native city. An example is the musical genre known as yaraví, closely connected to the city's history and life. As a composer he was almost entirely self-taught, and although his works lack technical sophistication, they exhibit a frank national character in an impressionist idiom of the early 20th century. Good examples are the suggestive piano pieces Cayma and Yanahuara (named after towns of the Arequipa province). Sánchez Málaga's efforts to create a Peruvian style, without recourse to explicit thematic reference to folklore, were recognized in 1944 with the award of the Duncker Lavalle prize for his song Palomita de nieve. His music opened the way to an authentic and spontaneous mestizo expression.

CÉSAR ARRÓSPIDE DE LA FLOR/J. CARLOS ESTENSSORO

Sancho, Ignatius (b nr Guinea, West Africa, 1729; d London, 14 Dec 1780). English writer and composer of African descent. He was born on a slave ship en route from Guinea to Cartagena, Columbia (South America). At the age of two he was brought from Cartagena to England, where he was later befriended by John, 2nd Duke of Montagu, Mary, Duchess of Montagu and George Brudenell, 1st Duke of Montagu. Sancho reportedly appeared briefly in London productions of Othello and Oroonoko. After 1773 he opened a grocery and oil supply business in Westminster. He also corresponded with Laurence Sterne over the slave trade. Sancho is the earliest documented composer of African origin to have published music in the West. He published a collection of 62 songs, two sets of minuets and country dances for assorted instruments (all 'Composed by an African', London, *c*1767, *c*1769, *c*1770) and a set of 12 Country Dances for the Year 1779 (London, 1779). Most of these are small-scale compositions in an early classical style. All of his works have been published in facsimile, edited by J.R.B. Wright (New York, 1981). Sancho also wrote a Theory of Music, but this is no longer extant.

JOSEPHINE WRIGHT

Sancho Marraco, José (b La Garriga, Barcelona, 27 Feb 1879; d La Garriga, 17 Sept 1960). Catalan composer and choirmaster. He was a boy chorister at Barcelona Cathedral, where he studied with Viñes (piano) and Más y Serracant (organ and composition). At the age of 16 he was appointed organist of S Agustín, Barcelona, and in 1907 choirmaster. He was also music director at the Teatro Romea, Barcelona (1899–1908), conductor of the 'Montserrat' choir (1913–14) and choirmaster at Barcelona Cathedral (from 1923).

One of the most enthusiastic supporters of Otaño's movement for the restoration and purification of religious music in Spain, he took an active part in music organizations and congresses; above all, he contributed effectively to the movement with his own compositions, which were much used. Indeed, he was one of the most important 20th-century Spanish composers of liturgical music. All his works show perfection of shape and solid, varied craftsmanship; like those of his Spanish contemporaries, it may be said that they lie halfway between the austerities of the German Cecilian movement and the lyrical melodicism of Perosi.

He was given six dozen chickens for composing the villancicos for Christmas 1578. Sanctus. An acclamation of the Latin Mass, sung by choir or congregation at the conclusion of the Preface, just before the Canon, as the musical item most closely associated with the eucharistic phase of the Mass. Since the text of the Sanctus does not change from day to day, it is counted as part of the Ordinary of the Mass. Numerous melodies were composed from the 10th century onwards; a selection of these is contained in the Liber usualis, Masses I to XVIII, together with three ad libitum melodies.

The Sanctus text is the oldest of the acclamations of the Mass, even though it seems to have been added to the Eucharistic Prayer some time between the 1st century and the 5th. It functions as a conclusion for, and people's response to, the Preface (sung by the celebrant), a rehearsal of God's acts with particular emphasis on those for which thanks are to be rendered on a given occasion. In the early centuries (at least until 800), the Sanctus was sung by everyone, clergy and people, as a terrestrial analogue of the celestial praises of Cherubim and Seraphim described in Isaiah vi.3 (whence the text comes). In the same context the Sanctus appears in the Te Deum, the great prose hymn dating from before the 6th century.

The same Sanctus text is used in Greek in the Eastern liturgies in the same way. There is, however, another 'thrice-holy', the Greek TRISAGION ('Holy God, holy and mighty, holy and immortal, have mercy upon us') which is a different item with a different liturgical function; it appears in the Roman rite only on Good Friday.

Sanctus melodies appear in Western manuscripts from the 10th century onwards. Thannabaur's catalogue lists 230; there are eight more in Hiley's supplement (1986), and a number of others in an edition by Atkinson (MMMA, forthcoming), bringing the total to over 270 (see MGG2). Distribution of the melodies among the sources shows (as for other items of the Ordinary) that a few melodies, largely from the 11th and 12th centuries, were widely known and used, while a much larger number of melodies were purely local products, appearing in only one or a few manuscripts. Composition of melodies continued throughout the later Middle Ages, especially during the 15th century.

Among the early Western manuscripts a melody is preserved with the Greek text and is presumed to be a Byzantine import (Huglo); the presumption has been substantiated, at least for the first part of the melody ('Agios, agios, agios') by a Greek melody from the 13th or 14th century that probably represents an earlier Byzantine congregational practice (Levy). The same melody for the three acclamations 'Sanctus, sanctus, sanctus', however, also appears in the melody for the Te Deum as contained in Western manuscripts from the 12th century, and is presumed to be much older than that. Levy argued, on these and additional grounds, that some form of the entire Sanctus melody (through the repetition of 'Hosanna in excelsis') was in use from very early times as the only Sanctus melody in both Greek and Latin rites. In spite of the circumstantial nature of most of the evidence, it seems likely that the 'melismatic arches' for 'Sanctus, sanctus, sanctus', at least, represent a 10th or 11th-century reminiscence of a – possibly the – much older universal congregational melody.

Many of the melodies in the early Western manuscripts are different in nature from such a simple congregational melody; they reflect monastic origin and (presumably) performance by a trained choir or schola, although congregational performance of the Sanctus is documented as late as the 12th century in France. The monastic repertory contains melodies with elaborately worked-out construction, both in phrase shapes and motivic detail. In that respect they recall the Kyrie and to a lesser degree the Gloria chants of the same period; but from the distribution in the sources, the Sanctus repertory seems to have been established a century later than the Gloria (10th–11th rather than 9th–10th centuries) and possibly a little later than the Kyrie as well. In addition, Sanctus melodies have their structural and stylistic idiosyncrasies, due partly to the text and partly, it seems, to musical conventions developed during the 11th century.

The Sanctus is usually set as five main phrases: 'Sanctus ...', 'Pleni ...', 'Hosanna ...', 'Benedictus ...', 'Hosanna ...', and many of the more elaborate settings use some degree of melodic repetition or parallelism among these five phrases. Often the second 'Hosanna' repeats the music of the first; most interesting are the cases in which the repetition is not exact, but deliberately modified to carry out the motivic system (as in Sanctus VII/Thannabaur no.54). And in the highly structured style of the 11th and 12th centuries, absence of repetition does not mean absence of carefully controlled structure.

The phrase 'Benedictus ...' is often set parallel to 'Pleni ...' using the same basic line adapted to the different text. 'Benedictus' is longer and tends to break into two subphrases; some melodic settings put these differences to artistic advantage (Sanctus VIII/116). Sometimes the parallelism is only approximate, but the treatment is such as to suggest that the intent was to depart from a fairly firm convention of parallelism. The net effect of all these repetitions is to cast the Sanctus as a whole into an ABB plan.

The opening acclamations are parsed variously by different composers: 'Sanctus sanctus sanctus Dominus Deus Sabaoth' is frequent but alternates with other, sometimes less determinate, arrangements (as in Sanctus XV/223). The triple 'Sanctus' itself, regardless of the presence or absence of grouping with 'Dominus', is less often set as three similar melodic units (as in Levy's proto-Sanctus), more often in some alternating fashion (ABA: Sanctus III/56) that suggests the antiphonal performance inherent in the scriptural context of the Sanctus: 'And one called to another and said: Holy, holy, holy ...'. In some cases, however, there is no such plan, three different settings of the word 'Sanctus' being subsumed under an artfully conceived longer line (Sanctus XI/202).

Elaborate motivic systems that cut across the larger phrase structure are frequent in the Sanctus repertory and are characteristic of it. Sanctus II/203 uses the same motif at the start of the first and third 'Sanctus', 'Pleni', both 'Hosanna', and 'Benedictus'. Sanctus VI/17, XII/177 and XIV/184 derive subsequent material from the opening phrase in various sophisticated ways. One of the most popular Sanctus chants of the medieval repertory, Sanctus IV/49, has the effect of cycling through the same material in ever-changing configurations.

The Sanctus was provided with tropes, which often took the form of additional epithets interpolated after each 'Sanctus', for example (GB-Ob Bodley 775, f.72*v*):

> Sanctus Deus pater ingenitus;
> Sanctus Filius eius unigenitus;
> Sanctus Dominus Spiritus Sanctus paraclitus ab utroque procedens Deus Sabaoth (etc.)

Such interpolations are entirely different in musical structure and effect from the highly integrated melodies of the more elaborate Kyries with Latin texts. Some Sanctus melodies were provided with extensive settings of 'Hosanna', and these with additional text in rhyming, scanning verses – a typically 11th–12th century product.

Polyphonic settings of the Sanctus survive from the 12th century onwards (edns in Lütolf). The separation of the Benedictus from the Sanctus and its performance at the Elevation is not known before the 16th century; this practice is reflected in many polyphonic settings.

RICHARD L. CROCKER/DAVID HILEY

Sandagerði, Pauli í (b Tórshavn, 28 Jan 1955). Faeroese composer and conductor. He passed the teacher training examination in 1980, then studied composition with, among others, Atli Heimir Sveinsson in Iceland, John Hearne in Scotland and Svend Aaquist Johansen in Denmark. He is the permanent conductor of the girls' choir Cantabile, which has toured with his works throughout Europe, and he plays a prominent role in the organization of Faeroese musical life: in 1981 he helped found the Faeroese musicians' association and in 1983 he became chairman of the composers' association in the Islands. As a composer he first attracted attention with a Sonata for piano and flute (1976) which was praised by the poet William Heinesen for its 'creative imagination and poetic depth'. He has since gained recognition for works such as the musical Jesus and the Macedonian (1984) and Gerandisdagur í Havn ('Everyday Life in Tórshavn', 1989). He is a brilliant exponent of instrumentation, but the emphasis in his output is on vocal music, where he shows a sense of the peculiar sound and rhythm of the Faeroese language. Stylistically the works range widely, although most are distinguished by a lyrical Expressionism with links to both Hindemith and Lars-Erik Larsson. They often accommodate elements from the south-east European song tradition.

SOREN HALLUNDBAEK SCHAUSER

Sandberg, Mordecai (b Suceava, Romania, 4 Feb 1897; d Toronto, 28 Dec 1973). American composer of Jewish parentage. While a medical student at the University of Vienna (diploma 1921) it is likely that he came into contact with Willi von Moellendorff, a pioneer of quarter-tone music, and with members of the Schoenberg circle. In 1922 he emigrated to Palestine, where, in addition to establishing a clinic in Jerusalem, he began to compose and perform music in a tuning system approximating just intonation. He gave courses in aural training to sensitize the public to microtonal intervals, constructed microtonal instruments to use in demonstrations, and obtained a quarter-tone harmonium. He designed and had built a twelfth-sixteenth-tone harmonium from Straube of Berlin (1929). After speaking on microtonal music at an international conference in London (1938), he travelled to New York, where, with the outbreak of war, he was compelled to remain. Rather than requalifying as a physician in the USA, he devoted the rest of his life to music. During the 1940s, he gave several concerts of his works in New York. Thereafter, his music received few public performances. In 1970 he and his wife, the painter Hannah Sandberg, moved to Toronto, where he taught at York University.

Sandberg felt that the Hebrew language should be set to music that respected the tuning systems of its origins. For him, music was 'sounding Kabbalah and arose from meditation on a sacred text. He began, sparingly at first and then more liberally, to use signs in his scores to raise and lower equal-tempered pitches by a third, a quarter and an eighth of a tone. He set a few chapters of the Torah, the 17 books of the Prophets, Proverbs and the Song of Solomon. His Symphonic Psalms form the centrepiece of his oeuvre. From Jewish mysticism, modernist musical aesthetics and an universalistic idealism, he produced a vast corpus of music that stands close in intent to the humanistic Hassidism of Martin Buber. Only a small fraction of his approximately 20,000 pages of music manuscript has been published.

AUSTIN CLARKSON

Sandberger, Adolf (b Würzburg, 19 Dec 1864; d Munich, 14 Jan 1943). German musicologist and composer. He studied composition in Würzburg and Munich (1881–7) and musicology in Munich and Berlin (1883–7); his teachers included Rheinberger and Spitta. After receiving the doctorate from Würzburg University in 1887 with a dissertation on Cornelius, he was appointed curator of the music department of the Bavarian State Library in 1889. Completing his Habilitation with a work on Lassus in 1894, he became reader in musicology at the University of Munich in 1900 and full professor in 1904, the first to occupy these posts in what was then a newly autonomous discipline; he retired in 1930. With his reputation for sound scholarship and new methods of research, he became the founder of a Munich school of musicology and came to exert broad influence through the work of his many famous pupils: Kroyer, Einstein, Bücken, Kurt Huber, Bernet Kempers, Erich Schenk and Schiedermair. In the 1930s he was involved in a dispute with J.P. Larsen over Haydn authenticity.

Sandberger's primary areas of interest were 16th-century music and the Viennese Classicists; his writings on Lassus are still fundamental to Lassus research. Equally significant were his activities as an editor, publishing works of Lassus (1894–1927, with F.X. Haberl), the Denkmäler der Tonkunst in Bayern (1900–31) and the Neues Beethoven-Jahrbuch (1924–42). As the composer of two operas, songs, choruses and some chamber and instrumental music he tried with some success to assimilate the styles of his contemporaries Cornelius, Reger and Strauss. His membership of many learned societies both in and outside Germany indicates the widespread recognition granted to his scholarly attainments.

HORST LEUCHTMANN

Sander. German family of music publishers active in the firm of LEUCKART.

Sander, F. [J.] S(igismund) (b Bohemia, *c*1760; d Breslau [now Wrocław], 1796). Bohemian composer and keyboard player. At an early age he settled in Breslau, where he frequently appeared as a keyboard player in public concerts, though he supported himself chiefly as a music teacher. According to Schilling, for a long time Sander maintained a correspondence with C.P.E. Bach in Hamburg. His earlier works are mostly instrumental, but from 1795 to the end of his life he appears to have concentrated on composing for the musical theatre.

Each book of his Erste Sammlung of Clavier-Sonaten was reviewed in C.F. Cramer's Magazin der Musik (Hamburg, 1783–6/R, ii, 537–8, 1209–14). The first was praised for its appropriateness to the instrument, the quality of the harmony and its charming and tasteful original melodies, which do not rely on tunes from opera arias with hackneyed harp-like accompaniments. The reviewer of the second book confesses not to have been so pleasantly surprised for a long time; his praise is effusive and detailed. Unfortunately, no copy of this second book is known to be extant. Contrary to the playability of the 12 sonatas mentioned in the reviews, the report on the first two concertos (ibid., i, 923–4) stresses the great difficulty of the solo parts, which probably provide a good index to Sander's prowess as a performer.

The review of the sonatas is followed immediately by one of Das Gebeth des Herrn (ibid., ii, 1214–16), a work in which the composer demonstrates very good practical knowledge of the arousal of passions and musical declamation. However, the reviewer details serious reservations with respect to Sander's unvaried retention of melody and harmony in strophic settings containing many stanzas.

Sander published one pedagogical work, Kurze und gründliche Anweisung zur Fingersetzung für Clavierspieler (Breslau, 1791), with which he hoped to help amateurs overcome the technical difficulties in the works of composers like Haydn, Mozart, Hässler and Wolf. The manual contains a series of fingering patterns applicable to figurations, melodic formulas and chordal events commonly found in keyboard music of the Classical period; each hand is treated separately.

ELLWOOD DERR

Sanderling, Kurt (b Arys, East Prussia [now Orzysz, Poland], 19 Sept 1912). German conductor. After early studies in Königsberg and Berlin he joined the Berlin Städtische Oper in 1931 as a répétiteur, while studying privately, but in 1936 he was obliged to leave Germany as a refugee. He moved to Moscow and after making his début (1936) with the Moscow RSO was the orchestra's conductor until 1941, when he became conductor of the Leningrad PO. He directed the Leningrad orchestra jointly with Mravinsky, raising it to a high international standard in the 20 years he spent there. From 1939 to 1942 he served as conductor of the Kharkiv PO. In 1960 he returned to Germany as conductor of the Berlin SO, a position he held for 17 years. He was also chief conductor of the Dresden Staatskapelle from 1964 to 1967. At this period he began an international touring career, gaining particular success at the Prague, Salzburg, Vienna and Warsaw festivals, and in Britain, where he appeared with the Leipzig Gewandhaus Orchestra in 1970 and with the New Philharmonia Orchestra from 1972. In 1979 he embarked on a relationship with the Nippon SO in Tokyo and appeared with them on many occasions. In the 1990s his career enjoyed a remarkable revival through the release of many earlier recordings. Sanderling found acclaim for his intellectual grasp, his clarity of detail and the dramatic passion he brought to his performances. His Sibelius, Prokofiev, Tchaikovsky and Shostakovich won particular praise, as did the conduction of the music of Matthus, Mayer and Zechlin. Sanderling was widely honoured in the Soviet Union and in the German Democratic Republic.

CHARLES BARBER, JOSÉ BOWEN

Sanders, Ernest H(elmut) (b Hamburg, 4 Dec 1918). American musicologist of German birth. He began his schooling in Hamburg, then went to the USA where he studied the piano with Irwin Freundlich at the Juilliard School of Music from 1947 to 1950. As a graduate student in musicology at Columbia University he worked with Lang, Hertzmann and William J. Mitchell; he took the MA at Columbia in 1952 and the PhD in 1963. He became a lecturer at Columbia in 1954 and was appointed professor of music there in 1972. He retired in 1986. His principal area of study has been medieval English and French polyphony, particularly its style and notation. His writings on English medieval polyphony trace the influence of the English composers on their continental contemporaries.

PAULA MORGAN

Sanders, Robert Levine (b Chicago, 2 July 1906; d Delray Beach, FL, 26 Dec 1974). American composer. He studied at the Bush Conservatory, Chicago, with Edgar Nelson; in Rome with Respighi, Alessandro Bustini and Cesare Dobici; and in Paris with de Lioncourt and Paul Braud. From 1925 until 1929 he held a fellowship at the American Academy in Rome, where compositions of his were performed by the Augusteo Orchestra and other music societies. After his return to the USA, his orchestral piece Saturday Night (1933) found wide acceptance. He later conducted a performance of his Little Symphony no.1 (which was awarded a prize from the New York PO) at the Carnegie Hall and directed the Goldman Band in a performance of his Symphony for Concert Band.

Sibyl Sanderson in the title role of Massenet's 'Thaïs'

Sanders held a number of posts as performer, teacher and administrator. In Chicago he was conductor of the Chicago Conservatory SO and Civic Orchestra (1933–6) and served as organist and choirmaster at the First Unitarian Church (1930–38). He taught at the Meadville Theological School and the University of Chicago, and lectured on hymnology and liturgical music. He was also an editor of two Unitarian-Universalist hymnals. In 1938 he became dean of the School of Music at Indiana University, Bloomington, and from 1947 until 1972 he served on the staff of Brooklyn College.

Sanders's compositions explore a widened concept of tonality and are carefully structured and articulate. His style has been described as neo-classical and dissonant. He wrote extremely well for brass instruments; the Symphony for Concert Band, the Brass Quintet, and the Trombone Sonata are among his most effective works. His sensitivity to the inflections of the English language shows in his vocal compositions, notably in his large-scale setting of Whitman's Song of Myself.

SIEGMUND LEVARIE

Sanderson, Sibyl (b Sacramento, CA, 7 Dec 1865; d Paris, 15 May 1903). American soprano. She studied with Sbriglia and Mathilde Marchesi in Paris and made her début (under the name of Ada Palmer) as Massenet's Manon at The Hague in 1888. Massenet, impressed by her beauty and her voice with its range of three octaves, wrote the title roles in two operas for her: Esclarmonde, in which she made her Paris début at the Opéra-Comique in 1889; and Thaïs, in which she made her Opéra début in 1894 (see illustration). She appeared in Brussels (1890–91) and at Covent Garden (1891), where she sang Manon. She created the title role in Saint-Saëns's Phryné (1893, Opéra-Comique) and also sang Gilda and Gounod's Juliet. She sang in St Petersburg, Moscow and New York, making her Metropolitan début in 1895 as Manon opposite Jean de Reszke. She did not have an outstandingly large or beautiful voice, but its phenomenal range compensated for any lack of size and warmth.

ELIZABETH FORBES

conductor, organist and teacher. He was an assistant to Sir Frederick Bridge, the organist of Westminster Abbey from 1897 to 1904. Sanderson was subsequently organist at various London churches before moving to Doncaster in 1904 to become organist at the parish church, a post he held until 1923. He also conducted the Doncaster Amateur Operatic Society (1910–35), the Doncaster Musical Society (1912–24) and the Doncaster Thespian Amateur Operatic Society (1922–31). His pupils at this time included the baritone Topliss Green, later to become Director of Singing Studies at the RCM. Sanderson went on to work for the publisher Cramer, examine for the Associated Board of the Royal Schools of Music and adjudicate at music festivals.

Most notably Sanderson composed songs, usually ballads, which became popular and are still performed: Until sold one million copies. Their commercial success may be judged by his considerable estate of £51,054 at the time of his death. Sanderson's finest and best-known songs were written before 1924 and, while their lyrics are often undistinguished, the memorably generous vocal lines are well suited to the voice. Many of the songs cater for the English love of the sea, while others are inspired by the English landscape, notably that of Cornwall, Devon and Somerset.

PHILIP L. SCOWCROFT

Sandi, Marvin (b Potosí, 17 May 1938; d Madrid, 1968). Bolivian composer. He studied in Potosí with Díaz Gaínza and from 1957 at the National Conservatory in Buenos Aires with Jurafsky, Sáenz and Fischer, and later in the workshops led by Paz. During those years he returned to Bolivia several times to present performances of his own compositions and lecture on contemporary music. Later he studied philosophy at the Colegio Libre de Estudios in Buenos Aires. Finally he moved to Madrid in 1966, where he committed suicide two years later in obscure circumstances. His creative language was influenced by Schoenberg's early period, Stravinsky's neo-classical works and the nationalism of Eduardo Caba. Works published by Ricordi in Buenos Aires include In memoriam: homenaje a Eduardo Caba, Ritmos panteíscos and Ronda, marcha y preludio, all for piano. He also published philosophical essays, including La primera piedra: sobre música y filosofía (Potosí, 1981).

CARLOS SEOANE

San Diego. City in California, USA. Located on the Pacific coast, it lies near the US-Mexican border. Juan Rodríguez Cabrillo, who entered the harbour in 1542, called the area San Miguel; it was renamed San Diego in 1602. In 1769 the Spanish government sent a military expedition with 16 Franciscans to establish garrisons and to found missions; in July Junípero Serra established the Mission San Diego de Alcalá, and dedicated the Presidio, the first Spanish fort in California. The city was incorporated in 1850 and has developed into an important musical centre in the western USA.

1. Early musical life. 2. Development of a local musical culture. 3. The modern era: (i) Orchestras (ii) Opera (iii) Other ensembles and performance venues (iv) Education.

1. Early musical life. Before the arrival of European settlers, the area was inhabited by Diegueño Indians. Their music, primarily vocal, was characterized by syllabic melodies, unison singing and a distinctive three-part structure; gourd rattles were the only instruments used for accompaniment. In his first report to the Mexico City viceroy (1773), Fray Francisco Palóu wrote that what attracted the Indians to Mission San Diego was 'their fondness for hearing the neophytes sing'. A spinet was brought to the mission and was used to accompany the celebration of mass at the Presidio (see Bolton). By 1776 a boys' choir had been formed there. The earliest 'organ' to reach San Diego was a three-cylinder barrel instrument given in 1793 by the explorer George Vancouver to Fermín de Lasuén, president of the California missions. Built by Benjamin Robson of London in 1735, it played 30 tunes, including Go to the Devil, College Hornpipe, Lady Campbell's Reel and Spanish Waltz. Juan Bandini, born in Peru and a resident of San Diego during much of his life, introduced the waltz in California in 1820. At Christmas 1837, while the religious play El diablo en le pastorela was performed in Pío Pico's house in San Diego, the women sang hymns of adoration; some of these hymns and fragments of pastorela music are at the Whaley manuscript collection of the Serra Museum, San Diego Historical Society.

2. Development of a local musical culture. In 1868 a minstrel show, Negro Delineations, was given by the Tanner Troupe. The second floor of Horton Hall (built 1869, destroyed by fire in 1897) opened as a theatre in 1870. Although some well-known touring artists appeared there, including the soprano Anna Bishop (1873), the pianist Arabella Goddard (1875) and the violinist Emile Sauret with his wife Teresa Carreño (1875), the hall was used chiefly as a venue for local performers.

Six other theatres were built in the decades surrounding the turn of the century. In 1887 musical events also took place at the Villa Montezuma, the residence of Jesse Shepard, a flamboyant pianist and singer known for his improvisations. At San Diego's centennial celebration, held in 1876, Eli T. Blackmer led the San Diego Philharmonic Society (founded 1872) in a performance of Hail to thee, Liberty! and conducted 200 schoolgirls in Hail our country's natal morn. Instrumental airs were played by the Silver Cornet Band (founded 1874), an ensemble of 12 players. The first brass band in San Diego was organized in 1869 and consisted of seven musicians; other brass ensembles included the Harmonie Cornet Band (1875), whose ten members were mostly German immigrants, and the City Guard Band (1885), which gave its inaugural concert at Armory Hall to celebrate the completion of the California Southern Railroad line.

In the 1880s two conservatories were formed: one, founded in 1882, was led by Maurice H. Strong; the other was led from 1887 to 1890 by J.H. Hill. The Reform Congregation Beth Israel, which celebrated Jewish high holy days with an organ and a choir, was established in 1887. An important music organization, the Amphion Club, was formed in 1893; from 1907 to its dissolution in 1948 it sponsored concert series bringing touring artists. The club's longtime president, Gertrude Gilbert, wrote the first published history of music in San Diego (1936), and the composer Alice Barnett served on its board of directors (1920–48)

3. The modern era.

(i) Orchestras. In 1902 the San Diego SO was formed with 54 members; it was directed first by R.E. Trognitz, and from 1910 by Richard Schliewen of Berlin. Under Schliewen the orchestra played Beethoven's First Symphony in 1910 and his Fifth in 1911. Schliewen was succeeded by Lionel Gittelson (1879–1963), a violinist from South Carolina who had been trained in New York. The following season Buren Roscoe Schryock assumed the orchestra's leadership; he remained until 1920.

From 1927 to 1936 Nino Marcelli (b Rome, 21 Jan 1890; d San Diego, 4 Aug 1967) conducted an orchestra that included members of the San Diego SO supplemented by other local musicians. The San Diego SO appeared under his direction at the California-Pacific International Exposition in 1935, where the Los Angeles PO and orchestras from Seattle, San Francisco and Portland, Oregon, were also heard. Nikolai Sokoloff conducted summer concerts of the San Diego SO at Ford Bowl from 1938 to 1941; he presented works by William Grant Still and A Trojan Legend by the local composer Charles Marsh. After World War II the San Diego SO lacked a permanent conductor until Robert Shaw's appointment as music director for summer seasons in Balboa Park (1953–8); during these six summers he taught choral workshops with Julius Herford at San Diego State College (now San Diego State University). Under the direction of Earl Bernard Murray (1959–66), the San Diego SO played several works by local composers: in 1961 the Variations for Orchestra and in 1966 the Variations and Dance on California Mission Themes by Robert Heinzinger, a member of the faculty at Mesa College; in 1962 the Symphony 1959 by David Ward-Steinman, from 1961 a faculty member at San Diego State University; and in 1965 Conrad Susa's Pastorale. The San Diego SO performed for several years in San Diego High School's Russ Auditorium before moving in 1966 to the San Diego Civic Theater (cap. 3000).

During the 1966–7 season the San Diego SO was led by a series of guest conductors including Carlos Chávez; it was then conducted by the Hungarians Zoltan Rozanyai (1967–70) and Peter Erös (1972–81), whose tenure was marked by some controversy over programming practices. The English conductor David Atherton served as musical director from 1981 to 1987. Financial difficulties led the orchestra to cancel its summer season in 1982. On 7 November 1985, however, the orchestra gave its opening night of the season in its new venue, the Fox Theater, purchased for $7.5 million in 1984. In March 1988 Murry Sidlin replaced Fabio Mechetti as interim conductor. Yoav Talmi was subsequently appointed music director, with Jung-Ho Pak as assistant director. When Wesley Brustad, executive director from 1986, quit in 1993 the symphony owed a debt of $900,000. After what was billed as the last concert in Copley Symphony Hall (13 January 1996) the orchestra declared bankruptcy. In 1998, with the help of Voice of the Symphony Audience, an independent organization established in October 1995, the San Diego SO once more started giving performances. Jung-Ho Pak was appointed artistic director and principal conductor.

(ii) Opera. Between 1919 and 1932 the San Diego Civic Grand Opera Association gave more than 40 productions of French and Italian works. The San Diego Opera Company was formed in 1964. In 1967 the city was the site of the American première of Henze's Der junge Lord. Capobianco succeeded Walter Herbert as director of the company in 1975; in 1978 he initiated an annual Verdi Festival, emphasizing lesser-known works. Under his direction Menotti's La loca was given its world première in 1979, with Beverly Sills in the title role, and his 1982–3 season included productions of such neglected operas as Verdi's Il corsaro, Saint-Saëns's Henry VIII, Chabrier's Gwendoline and Zandonai's Giulietta e Romeo, all performed in the Civic Theater (cap. 2902). To mark its 20th anniversary (1984–5) the San Diego Opera commissioned Leonardo Balada to write an opera based on the life of Emiliano Zapata. Capobianco left the company in 1983 and was succeeded by Ian D. Campbell. Campbell's reversion to a more conservative repertory, using original languages with surtitles, drew increased support from private organizations. Later notable productions have included Dialogues des Carmélites (1990) and Albert Herring (1991).

(iii) Other ensembles and performance venues. In 1996 the orchestras offering regular series of programmes included the La Jolla Symphony (Mandeville Center for the Performing Arts, University of California), the San Diego Chamber Orchestra (Sherwood Auditorium, Rancho Santa Fe), the San Diego State University SO (Smith Recital Hall) and the Tifereth Israel Community Orchestra (various auditoriums). The following organizations gave concert series: the International Chamber Players, La Jolla Chamber Music Society, Point Loma Nazarene College, Poway Center for the Performing Arts Foundation and the San Diego Early Music Society.

(iv) Education. The San Diego campus of the University of California was opened in 1964 at La Jolla and offers BA, MA and PhD degrees in music. In the mid-1990s the music department had 15 full professors and 14 other faculty members; the chair was Rand Steiger, a specialist in computer applications. In 1971 the Computer Audio Research Laboratory was established. Those on the faculty in the 1990s included Jann C. Pasler, Roger Reynolds, Jane Stevens and Bertram Turetzky. In 1995 San Diego State University awarded BA, BM, MM and MA degrees in 16 designated music areas. In the mid-1990s the School of Music and Dance had 56 active faculty and 19 retired faculty members.

ROBERT STEVENSON

Sandley. See STANDLEY.

Sandoni, Pietro Giuseppe (b Bologna, 1 Aug 1685; d Bologna, 16 Aug 1748). Italian composer and harpsichordist. A pupil of Angelo Predieri and Giovanni Bononcini in counterpoint, he was taught the harpsichord by Francesco Salardi. In 1698 he was organist at the Bolognese church of S Giacomo Maggiore. He was admitted to the Accademia Filarmonica in 1700 as organist and two years later was promoted to the rank of composer. He served as principe in 1713, 1714, 1739 and 1745. Known chiefly as a harpsichordist, he travelled to Vienna, Munich and London, 1715–16, where his keyboard improvisations were compared with those of Handel. He also taught singing and probably contributed music to Pyrrhus and Demetrius in 1716. In 1722 Handel sent him to Venice to bring back the famous soprano Francesca Cuzzoni; the two were married on 12 January 1725. In London, he established himself as an eccentric personality and became involved in the controversies between Handel and Bononcini and between his wife and Faustina Bordoni. In 1728 the couple travelled to Vienna, Venice and Genoa; from 1734 to 1737 they were again in London, where Sandoni's opera Issipile was performed in 1735. In 1737–8 he was in Florence, where he was responsible for church music. He worked in Amsterdam *c*1740 as harpsichordist, organist and composer. By 1745 he had returned to Bologna, where ill-health and financial difficulties plagued him until his death.

Of his operas and oratorios only the librettos remain. His keyboard sonatas, published between 1726 and 1728 at the end of his Cantate da camera, are the earliest keyboard sonatas published in England. They are in two or three movements, with thin and fluent texture, and include dance movements and free types. Of the three sonatas published in London in about 1727, the first and third are in the style and form of the late Baroque suite. The second consists of only two movements: an Allegro featuring arpeggios and 'Alberti bass' figures in a pre-Classical style, and a Minuetta con variazioni, a set of nine figural variations with a two-part texture. This sonata is perhaps the first of its kind ending with a variation movement. Pre-classical traits are also present in his printed cantatas.

Sándor, György (b Budapest, 21 Sept 1912). American pianist of Hungarian birth. He is the cousin of Arpád Sándor. He studied the piano with Bartók and composition with Kodály at the Liszt Academy of Music in Budapest, where he made his début in 1930. He performed elsewhere in Europe, then settled in the USA following his Carnegie Hall début in 1939, the same year in which he began a series of international tours. Sándor's repertory extended from Bach to Prokofiev. Noteworthy among his many recordings are those of the complete solo piano works of Prokofiev and Kodály, and of the piano solos and concertos of Bartók; for the last he won the Grand Prix du Disque in 1965. He also gave the premières of Bartók's Dance Suite (piano version, Carnegie Hall, 1945) and Piano Concerto no.3 (with the Philadelphia Orchestra, 1946), and his own piano version of the Tempo di ciaccona and Fuga from Bartók's Sonata for Solo Violin (New York, 1975). Among his publications are editions of works by Prokofiev and Khachaturian, a number of transcriptions, including Shostakovich's Danse russe and Dukas' L'apprenti sorcier, and a book, On Piano Playing: Motion, Sound and Expression (New York, 1981). He taught at Southern Methodist University (1956–61) and was director of graduate studies in piano at the University of Michigan (1961–81) before he joined the faculty of the Juilliard School in 1982.

RUTH B. HILTON

Sandrin [Regnault, Pierre] (b ?St Marcel, nr Paris, ?*c*1490; d ?Italy, after 1560). French composer. Pierre Regnault, like his brothers and his sister, apparently took his sobriquet from a late-15th-century farce, Le savetier qui ne respont que chansons, in which a cobbler named Sandrin answers every question put to him by singing a chanson incipit. A payment made by the royal treasury on 16 December 1506 for the educational expenses of a youth named Pierre Sandrin suggests that Pierre Regnault dit Sandrin may have been a choirboy at the French royal court. In 1517 he was employed as an adult singer by Louise de Savoy, after which his name vanishes from court records for over 20 years. During this period he may have had employment as an actor – a play from the mid-16th century refers to a singer named 'Pierre Regnault' as a 'badin antien' (an actor no longer on the stage).

Records pertaining to Sandrin's contested appointment as dean of the chapter of St Florent-de-Roye in Picardy indicate that by 1539 he had entered the Chapelle du roi as a singer. Four years later the courtier Claude Chappuys in his lengthy panegyric to the court of François I, Discours de la court (1543), singled out Sandrin and Claudin de Sermisy as two of the most respected musical figures there. Indeed Sandrin is described as 'composeur' of the royal chapel in the documents listing the musicians who took part in the funeral services for François I in 1547, the earliest documents yet found from the French court that give such a title to a musician. Clearly he remained in close contact with the royal court after François's death, since archival records concerning benefices he obtained in 1549 and 1560 cite him as 'chantre ordinaire et chanoine de la Chapelle du roi', though in March 1554 he was in Siena serving as maestro di cappella at the court of Ippolito d'Este, Cardinal of Ferrara and France's representative at the Vatican. In the autumn of 1560 Sandrin was in Paris taking care of the financial affairs of his two brothers, both of whom had recently died, and making his own will. The following year he was back in Rome with the cardinal, but after that all trace of him is lost and he may have died there shortly afterwards.

Although he worked in chapel choirs during most of his recorded professional career, Sandrin seems never to have composed sacred music (unless it is all lost). His complete surviving works comprise 50 chansons and one madrigal. All except two were published for the first time between 1538 and 1549, mostly by Pierre Attaingnant in Paris and Jacques Moderne in Lyons; many were then reprinted by those and other publishers. Only two examples of Sandrin's work during his last years survive, the chanson Amour si haut, published by Le Roy & Ballard in 1556, and the madrigal Amor, l'arco e la rete indarno tendi, which appeared in the fourth book of madrigals by Cipriano de Rore in 1557, attributed to Sandrino. Although Einstein assumed Sandrino to be Alessandro Striggio, the name probably refers to Regnault.

Most of Sandrin's music published before 1543 is written in the typical Parisian chanson style associated especially with the work of Claudin de Sermisy. It is predominantly chordal, although imitation and other contrapuntal detail are prominent. Often the first phrase or two and the last phrase are repeated. And Sandrin's chansons often begin with a characteristic opening motto, the first half-line of text being set to a distinctive melodic fragment and separated from the remainder of the first phrase. While Sandrin continued to publish similar lyric miniatures, between 1543 and 1549 he directed his attention to developing a more flexible rhythmic style, perhaps to avoid the uniformity of his earlier works. Some of these chansons have the characteristic dance-like rhythms of the frottola, in triple metre with hemiolas. In others Sandrin experimented with ways to integrate duple and triple metre within a single short work, apparently to allow the text to be declaimed in a supple and stylish manner. Thus even a relatively simple chanson like Reveillez vous mes damoiselles displays a highly sophisticated rhythmic style. His last published chanson, Amour si haut, reveals the influence of his Italian environment; it is more contrapuntal and more chromatic than most of his earlier chansons, and madrigalisms abound. Indeed his only madrigal proves that he was able to assimilate the Italian style completely during his later years.

Although Sandrin is a minor figure, his chansons are superbly elegant examples of this lyric genre. That they were highly esteemed by his contemporaries is demonstrated not only by the number of times they were reprinted and used as models for parody masses, but also by their wide distribution in the instrumental anthologies of the time. Over and over again lutenists and keyboard players chose Sandrin's music to arrange for their instruments. His chanson Doulce memoire, for example, was among the most popular compositions of the entire century, to judge from the number of times it was reprinted, arranged for instruments and parodied.

Sandström, Jan (Inge Håkan) (b Vilhelmina, 25 Jan 1954). Swedish composer and teacher. He was brought up in Stockholm but studied at the College of Music in Piteå (1976–8) and between 1978 and 1984 continued his studies at the Royal College of Music in Stockholm, where his teachers were Bucht, Ferneyhough, Pär Lindgren, Mellnäs, Wallner, Rosell and Eklund. In 1982 he began to teach at the College of Music in Piteå, and in 1984–5 lived in Paris. In 1989 he became professor of composition at the college in Piteå.

Sandström has said that he wishes to write music akin to the novels of John Steinbeck – beautiful and accessible on the surface but possessing great depth. His music frequently shows Romantic traits in its colourful tonal language and distinctive instrumental elements such as the use of musette and accordion in the opera Bombi Bitt (1991–2). He has also utilized the opportunities of the concerto form for its virtuoso effects (two trumpet concertos, two saxophone concertos and a number of works for trombone and orchestra), at the same time seeking to create a multidimensional experience through his harmonic vocabulary.

ROLF HAGLUND

Sandström, Sven-David (b Borensberg, 30 Oct 1942). Swedish composer. He studied history of art and musicology at Stockholm University (1963–7) and composition at the Royal College of Music in Stockholm (1968–72) with Lidholm, Ligeti and Nørgård. He was professor of composition at the Royal College of Music in Stockholm (1985–95) and its pro-rector until 1998. Following his international breakthrough with the Concertgebouw Orchestra's interpretation of Through and Through in Amsterdam in 1972, his output was dominated by instrumental music up to the time of the enormous attention his Requiem 'De ur alla minnen fallna' ('The Totally Forgotten') attracted after its première in 1982, partly because of the provocative text by the poet Tobias Berggren. It was awarded the Nordic Council Music Prize in 1984. His 20 years of choral singing experience in Hägersten's motet choir was of good service to him in a number of his choral and musical dramatic works such as A Cradle Song/The Tyger, the 90-minute long High Mass (which can be viewed as a synthesis of his entire output), the oratorio Moses for the 300th anniversary of Oslo Cathedral and the opera Staden ('The City'). A reorientation towards an outward-looking neo-Romantic style characterized the Cello Concerto (1989) and the Piano Concerto (1990) and again made him the subject of great attention and attack, but his strong expressiveness is a characteristic feature of the whole of his output.

In 1791 she was engaged as a singer at the Imperial Theatres, where she was extremely popular. With her husband, the actor Sila Nikolayevich Sandunov, she worked from 1794 in the Petrovsky Theatre, Moscow; but they were divorced in 1810 and in 1813 Sandunova returned to St Petersburg, where she performed frequently until her retirement in 1823. Renowned for her wide-ranging and expressive voice, she was one of the finest operatic singers of the early 19th century and took leading roles in numerous operas.

GEOFFREY NORRIS

Sandvik, Ole Mørk (b Nes, 9 May 1875; d Holmenkollen, nr Oslo, 5 Aug 1976). Norwegian musicologist. He was trained as a teacher (1895) and while holding a teaching position studied theology (graduating in 1902) and music with his father Paul Sandvik and the Oslo violinist Gudbrand Bøhn. After studying in Germany (1913) he taught at the Hegdehaugen School in Oslo (1913–45), as well as church music at the Seminary for Practical Theology of the University of Oslo (1916–45); he and Olav Gurvin gave the first regular lecture courses in music at the university (1937–9) which resulted in the establishment, after the war, of a music faculty.

Sandvik began to collect folk music in 1910 and was able to include about 400 melodies in Folkemusikk i Gudbrandsdalen (1919). He decided that this repertory (from a small district in eastern Norway) contained early elements which could be described as characteristic of Norwegian folk music in general, a view he argued in Norsk folkemusikk: saerlig Østlandsmusikken (1921), for which the University of Oslo awarded him the doctorate in 1922 (it was the second ever given to a musicologist there). Sandvik did extensive fieldwork in different parts of Norway and in Sweden (1924), Ireland and Scotland (1927), where he investigated possible relationships with Norwegian folk music.

Sandvik's other main interest was church music. In 1941 he published Kingo-Tona, based on L.M. Lindeman's collection (1848) of the tunes sung to hymns of the 17th-century Danish bishop Kingo as they had survived in Norwegian oral tradition. This was followed by a study of Lindeman as a collector of folk music. In his devotion to folk music and church music as the two pillars of national musical life Sandvik had much in common with Lindeman, though in his efforts to bring the two closer together he contradicted his predecessor on some issues. Thus in Norsk kirkemusikk og dens kilder (1918) he recommended that folktunes should be adapted as hymn melodies, a view which Lindeman initially held but later rejected. Sandvik was secretary (1923–6) of the committee appointed to revise the Norwegian hymnbook (Koralbok for den norske kirke, 1926), and effected the adoption of 37 folk melodies as hymn tunes and the restoration of the traditional rhythmical performance of many of the early melodies which Lindemann had abandoned in favour of a regular and simple chorale form. His Norsk koralhistorie (1930) was an important companion to the new hymnbook. Sandvik's efforts on behalf of church music also extended to liturgical matters: he published the Graduale: messbok for den norske kirke (1925) and a Vesperale for den norske kirke (1941), and helped to prepare the liturgical music for the 900th anniversary of the martyrdom of St Olaf (Trondheim, 1930; the medieval liturgy of St Olaf is given special attention in his Gregoriansk sang, 1945).

While pursuing these interests Sandvik also edited songbooks for school use, wrote and edited, with the composer Gerhard Schjelderup, a history of Norwegian music (1921–2; for 50 years the only work of its kind), founded the Norwegian Musicological Society and edited all its yearbooks from 1937 (the first issue) to 1972. He championed Norwegian composers, being the first to acclaim Fartein Valen, whose piano sonata he reviewed as early as 1915. He was responsible for the establishment of the Norsk Musikksamling in 1927 as a special division of the Oslo University library, a national music collection with its own reading room, programme of concerts, publications etc. He had a career of almost unique duration: as a young man he observed Grieg's methods of rehearsal and performance; at the age of 97 he published an account of the great hymn-tune controversy and had other projects in hand. He had an excellent memory, and though he did not write his memoirs the Norsk Musikksamling made several recordings of his recollections. For his 100th birthday his many friends contributed to the establishment of a fund to be named after him.

JOHN BERGSAGEL

Sandwich, 4th Earl of [Montagu, John] (b Lackham, Wilts., 3 Nov 1718; d London, 30 April 1792). English statesman and amateur musician. He followed a naval career, served as First Lord of the Admiralty in 1748–51 and 1771–82 and significantly reorganized the administration of the navy; he became embroiled in political conflict as a spokesman for George III, especially during the prosecution of John Wilkes and the American War. After his first period in office, Sandwich turned his energies to the performance of 'ancient' music which under his leadership was redefined from music of the 16th century to that two or more decades old. In this he was supported by his secretary, the amateur musician Joah Bates, who was an avid Handelian. While he was patron to the violinist Giardini, Sandwich's main early pursuit was the founding in 1761 of the aristocratic Catch Club, where professional singers performed catches, madrigals and glees, both ancient and modern. In the same period he held regular performances of Handel's oratorios, odes and masques at his estate, Hinchingbrooke, near Huntingdon, and at the parish church in Leicester. Thomas Greatorex, who joined Sandwich's household after a chance meeting in Leicester, assisted at these concerts in 1774–6, and the principal female singer was Martha Ray, Sandwich's mistress from about 1763 until her murder in 1779. Sandwich, Bates and Sir Watkin Williams Wynn were prime movers in the establishment in 1776 of the Concert of Ancient Music, the first public concert dedicated to a canonic repertory of old works. While Sandwich's performance on the timpani was the butt of many jokes, the programmes he supervised show a discerning taste, especially in the choice of Elizabethan madrigals. He was a director of the Handel Commemoration of 1784, and was one of the most influential musical amateurs of his day; he is now chiefly remembered as inventor of the food that bears his name.

WILLIAM WEBER

Sanelli, Gualtiero (b Parma, 14 May 1816; d Maranhão, Brazil, 15 Dec 1861). Italian composer and conductor. At a very early age he joined the chorus of the ducal theatre in Parma, where he later became a prompter. While studying singing at the Scuola di Musica in Parma, he also studied composition with Alinovi. From 1835 to 1839 he served as chorus master at the opera in Mantua. As a member of a touring opera company he visited Milan and other Italian cities, then (1841) Mexico and probably other Central American countries. On his return to Europe, he settled in Paris where he taught singing and began to study composition seriously; later he was active in England as a conductor of opera seasons organized by Italian impresarios. By 1858 he was resident conductor in Pernambuco, Brazil, where he had gone with an opera company organized by the impresario Mariangeli. From there he moved to Maranhão, where he died insane. Sanelli composed 11 operas, all first performed in Italy between 1838 and 1855 and conducted by him on his tours. Vocal scores of three of them, and excerpts from three others, were published by Ricordi, who also possessed the autograph scores.

San Francisco. City in California, USA. The area was settled by Franciscan missionaries who named it Yerba Buena; they so effectively taught European musical instruments and practices to the coastal Amerindian peoples that the indigenous musical culture was completely replaced and lost. The town was renamed San Francisco in 1847. After gold was discovered in the Sierra Nevada in 1848 it became the main supply city for the Gold Rush; boom town conditions stimulated an active musical life, supported by immigrants from all over the world. As the Central and Union Pacific railroads joined the East and West coasts (1869) and wealth began flowing in from the Nevada silver mines, San Francisco took on the socioeconomic character and the musical tastes of the eastern cities. Much of the city was destroyed by the great earthquake and fire of 1906, but its symphony orchestra (established 1911) and opera company (1923) have gone on to take their places among the most important in the country. By the end of the 20th century San Francisco's metropolitan area was the fifth most populous in the USA. The present article includes details of musical life in Berkeley, Oakland, Palo Alto, San Jose and other communities of the surrounding Bay Area.

1. OPERA AND MUSIC THEATRE. The first opera heard in San Francisco was Bellini's La sonnambula, performed in 1851 by the touring Pellegrini opera troupe. Between then and the earthquake of 1906, nearly 5000 operatic performances were given by more than 20 troupes in 26 different theatres. A succession of five of these were managed with conspicuous success by Tom Maguire, a former New York hack driver and bartender, who presented Shakespeare and opera on a grand scale. From the 1870s the term 'grand' began to be applied to opera companies and the form itself, distinguishing it from the new and popular operetta. The most famous theatre was the Tivoli which between 1879 and 1906 moved three times and was closed for only 40 nights, giving 4085 performances of operas, operettas and musical comedies. The largest theatre, Wade's Opera House (1876), was renamed the Grand Opera House; when its seating was expanded from 2500 to 4000 it became the second largest auditorium in the USA (fig.1).

The musical influence of the city's Mexican and South American populations was most clearly felt in dance. From the early years of the Gold Rush, many dance troupes arrived from Spain, usually by way of Central and South America. Spanish opera companies appeared after 1870, and the Spanish ballet companies of the 1880s had a strong influence on local music theatre, even into the vaudeville era of the 1920s and 30s. Chinese opera was introduced in 1852 when Hong Took Tong brought a troupe from Canton to entertain the 3000 Chinese residents of San Francisco with performances that included music, dance, acrobatics and costumed drama. Later troupes travelled to the mining towns to play for the 10,000 Chinese workers in the gold country. Performed by resident companies, Chinese opera flourished in the city for 100 years, becoming modernized and Westernized in the 1920s. Interest was renewed in the 1980s following a revival of the genre in New York.

The city was two decades old before black American performers began to take a role in theatrical and musical life. The minstrel shows popular during the Gold Rush had been performed exclusively by white performers in blackface, but in the 1860s black performers began forming their own minstrel troupes; by the 1870s they were performing in the city's principal theatres, including the Tivoli and Wade's. From the last decade of the 19th century black American dancers, singers and instrumentalists developed into variety entertainers and eventually entered vaudeville.

The renewal of opera performances after the earthquake of 1906 depended initially on the visits of touring companies. Gaetano Merola produced opera at the Stanford University football stadium in nearby Palo Alto in 1922, which led to the formation of the San Francisco Opera in 1923. The War Memorial Opera House (cap. 3252), built to accommodate both the opera and the symphony orchestra, was inaugurated in 1932 with Puccini's Tosca, with Merola conducting. Each of Merola's 30 seasons as general manager consisted of up to 30 performances of as many as 14 operas, concentrated in September and October. Merola died in 1953 while conducting at the Stern Grove Midsummer Music Festival (founded 1938); he was succeeded by Kurt Herbert Adler, who expanded the season to 12 weeks each autumn and included unusual works in the repertory. Before he retired in 1981 he had produced 11 major American premières and two world premières: Dello Joio's Blood Moon (1961) and Imbrie's Angle of Repose (1976). Adler introduced many innovatory programmes, particularly to encourage young American performers: the San Francisco Opera Auditions (from 1964), the Merola opera training programme, the Spring Opera (1961–82), the Western Opera Theater (a touring branch; 1966–96), the Brown Bag Opera (held at lunchtime; 1974), the San Francisco/Affiliate Artists Opera Program (1977), the American Opera Project (1979) and the Summer Opera Festival (1981–5).

Adler's successor in 1982, Terence A. McEwen, reorganized the company's subsidiary programmes under a new entity, the San Francisco Opera Center. He initiated a new production of Wagner's Ring (1983–4) and gave the American première of Tippett's The Midsummer Marriage (1983). Lotfi Mansouri succeeded McEwen in 1988. His widespread selection of repertory has included operas by Monteverdi, Vivaldi, Glinka, Dvořák, Borodin, Prokofiev, Henze and John Adams, and the première of Conrad Susa's Dangerous Liaisons (1994).

Opera companies in the surrounding communities include the West Bay Opera of Palo Alto (founded 1955), Marin Opera of San Rafael, Sonoma City Opera, Festival Opera (Walnut Creek), Berkeley Opera and San Jose Opera Theater. Pocket Opera (1968) offers concert performances of unusual works in English translation. The Lamplighters (1952), a Gilbert and Sullivan group, has sustained a large following.

2. CONCERT LIFE. Among the musicians lured to San Francisco by high wages during the Gold Rush were the pianist Henri Herz, who arrived in 1850; Rudolph Herold, conductor of the Germania Musical Society (1850–60); Miska Hauser, a Hungarian violinist who settled in the city in 1853 and organized recitals, chamber concerts and small orchestras; and the singers Eliza Biscaccianti and Catherine Hayes. The San Francisco Philharmonic Society first performed in 1852, giving Rossini's Stabat mater, the first oratorio heard in the city. German immigrants founded bands, orchestras and, by 1866, 17 choral societies.

After the 1906 earthquake, musical life recovered slowly. A milestone in the city's reconstruction was the International Exposition of 1915, with a year of musical events in Festival Hall including 121 recitals by Edwin Lemare (municipal organist 1917–21) on the hall's new Austin organ, which had 7500 pipes and 114 stops. A permanent Exposition Auditorium (cap. 12,000) was completed in 1915 and later renamed the Civic Auditorium. In its first years it was used for organ recitals, summer pops concerts, popular music concerts and early performances by the San Francisco Opera. In 1992 it was renamed the Bill Graham Auditorium; it was then renovated and seismically retrofitted, reopening in 1996. Other important concert venues are the Herbst Theater (cap. 928; originally the Veterans' Auditorium, 1932, renovated 1978), and the Yerba Buena Center for the Arts Theater (cap. 755) and Forum (cap. 500), both opened in 1993. In 1984 the largest concert hall organ in the USA, an electro-pneumatic instrument by Ruffati with 7373 pipes and 132 ranks, was inaugurated in Davies Symphony Hall (opened 1980; see §3 below).

Resident chamber ensembles have included the San Francisco String Quartet (1935–55); the California String Quartet (1948–62); the Griller String Quartet (1948–61) at the University of California, Berkeley; the Alma Trio and Stanford String Quartet (from 1984) at Stanford University; the Alexander String Quartet at California State University, San Francisco; the Francesco Trio; and the Aurora String Quartet. The Kronos Quartet, based in San Francisco from 1977, concentrates on contemporary music.

The music of other cultures, particularly Indian and Indonesian, became increasingly popular in the mid-1960s, fostered by such organizations as the American Society for Eastern Arts. Municipal support for the Neighborhood Arts Program and its cultural centres, and for individual centres such as the Casa Hispana de Bellas Artes, has encouraged the development of ethnic cultural activities, particularly in the Hispanic, African American and Chinese American communities.

Early music was first performed regularly in and around San Francisco during the 1950s by university and college ensembles; since then, many independent groups have been formed. The San Francisco Early Music Society (1976) includes most of these and itself presents concerts and workshops. The University of California and Stanford University support important teaching and performance programmes in early music. The Philharmonia Baroque Orchestra, founded in 1982, was conducted by Nicholas McGegan from 1985. It performs on period instruments and, sometimes with its own chorus, gives a 30-week season in San Francisco and four other communities, and records extensively. The American Bach Soloists (of Belvedere, 1989) perform primarily cantatas but occasionally other Baroque and Classical repertory, using period instruments. Other ensembles are Magnificat and The Whole Noyse (early wind music).

The leading choral groups of the area are the San Francisco Symphony Chorus, Oakland Symphony Chorus, San Francisco Choral Society (1989), San Francisco Chamber Singers, San Francisco Choral Artists, Pacific Mozart Ensemble, Baroque Choral Guild, Lesbian/Gay Chorus, San Francisco Boys Chorus, San Francisco Girls Chorus, Ragazzi (boys' chorus) and Chanticleer (1978), an ensemble of 12 male singers which has made an international reputation, particularly with Renaissance and contemporary music.

One of the first resident composers of significant influence was Ernst Bloch, director of the San Francisco Conservatory of Music (1925–30) and later professor at the University of California, Berkeley (1940–52). Henry Cowell and Harry Partch wrote and performed many of their highly original works in the Bay Area. Associations of composers and performers such as the San Francisco Contemporary Music Players (1974), Composers Inc. (1984) and Earplay (1985) have made important contributions. Influential early experimentation and performance using tape recorders and electronic instruments took place at the Morrison Planetarium in 1957, and then from 1961 at the San Francisco Tape Music Center, which evolved into the Center for Contemporary Music at Mills College, Oakland, in 1968. Activity in research and composition continues at the Center for Computer Research in Music and Acoustics at Stanford University and the Center for New Music and Technology at the University of California.

3. ORCHESTRAS. Two orchestras were established in the 1880s, a 40-member ensemble conducted by Louis Homeier and the Philharmonic Society Orchestra conducted by Gustav Hinrichs. A San Francisco Symphony Society was formed in 1895 and conducted for its first four seasons by Fritz Scheel.

The visit of Walter Damrosch with the New York Symphony Society in 1908 led to the organization of the Musical Association of San Francisco (1909), which soon established the San Francisco SO. On 8 Dec 1911 Henry Hadley conducted the orchestra in its first concert. His successor in 1915 was Alfred Hertz, who over the next 15 years instituted youth concerts, recordings and regular broadcasts, the 'Standard Hour', beginning in 1926. In 1924 Yehudi Menuhin, who received his early musical training in San Francisco, made his début at the age of seven, playing Lalo's Symphonie Espagnole. Isaac Stern, who studied with the concertmaster Naoum Blinder and with Louis Persinger, also made his orchestral début with the San Francisco SO, in 1936, when he was 15. Basil Cameron and Issay Dobroven shared the podium during the early 1930s. The year after the cancellation of the 1934–5 season because of the Depression, Pierre Monteux was engaged as music director. He presided over the orchestra's first illustrious period, including 40 recordings and a national tour (1947), before resigning in 1952. There were guest conductors for two seasons, and then Enrique Jorda became music director; his tenure ended in 1963 amid criticisms about performance standards and an adventurous repertory. Josef Krips (music director 1963–70) centred the repertory in the Classical and Romantic tradition, rebuilt playing proficiency and led the orchestra's first overseas tour, to Japan in 1968. Under Seiji Osawa (music director 1970–76) the orchestra increased in performing skills and audience, resumed recording after a 12-year hiatus, and toured Europe and the USSR in 1973 and Japan in 1975. The Symphony Chorus was established during this period.

Under Edo de Waart (music director 1977–85) the orchestra established a commissioning programme and annual festivals (of Beethoven, Mozart and contemporary music). The Louise M. Davies Symphony Hall (cap. 3063; fig.2) was opened in September 1980, and the symphony and opera orchestras became independent of one another. The San Francisco Symphony Youth Orchestra was established in 1981. Herbert Blomstedt was appointed music director of the San Francisco SO in 1985; his tenure saw acclaimed recordings and annual tours. In 1995 Michael Tilson Thomas became the orchestra's first American-born music director since Hadley; the change of style and his inventive programming took effect immediately.

The San Francisco SO has performed the annual summer pops series for the city's Art Commission since 1950, under Arthur Fiedler's direction from 1951 to 1978 and later under Erich Kunzel. Chamber orchestras active at the end of the 20th century were the San Francisco Chamber Orchestra (founded 1952) and the New Century Chamber Orchestra (1994). A number of communities in the Bay Area support their own orchestras. The San Jose SO, the oldest orchestra in California, was founded as the San Jose Symphonic Society in 1867 and incorporated in 1951. Other local orchestras are the Oakland SO (1933, renamed the Oakland East Bay SO in 1988), the Women's Philharmonic (1982), the Santa Rosa SO (1928), the Marin SO (1952), the Berkeley SO (1970), the California SO, Walnut Creek (1988), and community orchestras in Vallejo (1931), Napa (1933), Peninsula (1949), Redwood City/Woodside (1985), Palo Alto (1988), Sunnyvale, San Mateo, Fremont-Newark, Livermore-Amador, Los Altos and Saratoga.

4. Jazz and rock. The creative jazz period in San Francisco's history began with a revival of New Orleans jazz in the early 1940s, featuring such veteran New Orleans musicians as the trumpeter Bunk Johnson and the trombonist Kid Ory, who inspired younger musicians including Lu Watters and Turk Murphy. Although Murphy and others continued to perform in that style, their music was less popular in the 1950s than that of the bop musicians influenced by Charlie Parker and Miles Davis (among others), who frequently performed as guest artists in local clubs. A strong local strain of cool jazz was exemplified by the music of Dave Brubeck and his quartet. Since the brief flowering of jazz influenced by John Coltrane in the 1960s, various currents have continued in an eclectic manner.

In the mid-1960s San Francisco became the centre of emergent trends in rock music, especially those of FOLK-ROCK and PSYCHEDELIC ROCK. Among the best-known of the groups were Jefferson Airplane (later Jefferson Starship), the Grateful Dead, and Big Brother and the Holding Company, featuring Janis Joplin, all of which performed at one of the largest auditoriums, the Avalon. The number and variety of venues for rock and other popular music was extraordinary. There were free concerts in the Golden Gate Park and eclectic all-night sessions at the Fillmore Auditorium in the heart of the black American district from 1965 to 1971. An old high school auditorium renamed Family Dog presented concerts of Indian music and hard rock. Social protest music also thrived during this period. The songs of Joan Baez, who lived in nearby Carmel, and the Berkeley-based singer Malvina Reynolds were among the most popular. 'I-feel-like-I'm-fixin'-to-die' by Country Joe and the Fish, also from Berkeley, became an anthem of the anti-Vietnam War protest movement. By the mid-1970s, however, the energy and sense of community that had fuelled this sudden surge of activity had dissipated, and the Bay Area lost its importance as a trend-setting source of music in this style.

5. EDUCATIONAL INSTITUTIONS AND LIBRARIES. The Community Music Center (founded 1919) in the heart of the Mission District, an area largely populated by ethnic minorities, is the oldest music school in continuous existence in San Francisco, offering a broad curriculum to children and more recently to adults as well. The San Francisco Conservatory of Music was founded in 1917 as the Ada Clement Music School and took its present name in 1923. Ernest Bloch was its director from 1925 to 1930; Yehudi Menuhin, Ruggiero Ricci and Isaac Stern attended classes there. Under Milton Salkind (director from 1967), the school became an important conservatory. Its New Music Ensemble played a major role in stimulating composition and performance in advanced styles. Its annual festival, Chamber Music West, was initiated in 1977. Salkind was succeeded as director by Colin Murdoch in 1992.

In addition to the Berkeley and Davis campuses of the University of California, there are important centres of musical activity at the University of the Pacific in Stockton; the Dominican College in San Rafael; the California State University campuses in San Francisco, Hayward and San Jose; Stanford University; and Mills College. The San Francisco campus (established 1899, formerly San Francisco State University) of California State University offers among other degrees the BA in music and the MM in performance, and houses the Frank V. de Bellis collection of Italian music. The Stanford University music department at Palo Alto was established in 1947 with William Loren Crosten as chairman; it is strong in musicology and early music. It offers among other degrees the DMA in composition, the MA in music history and performance practice, and the PhD in historical musicology and computer-based music theory and acoustics. Under Albert Cohen, chairman from 1973, the Center for Computer Research in Music and Acoustics, directed by Chris Chafe, was founded in 1975. The music library contains important manuscripts of the late 18th century and the 19th; the scope of its Archives of Recorded Sound is second only to that of the Library of Congress within the United States. The music department, which houses the Harry R. Lange Collection of String instruments and the Asian Institute Collection of Instruments, moved into the Braun Music Center in 1984 and established a resident ensemble, initially the Stanford String Quartet and from 1999 the St Lawrence String Quartet. A Charles Fisk Baroque organ (mechanical action) of 4422 pipes and 73 ranks was inaugurated in the Stanford Memorial Church in 1984. In 1996 the Center for Computer Assisted Research in the Humanities, founded in 1984, became affiliated with the university.

Mills College in Oakland, which began as a seminary for girls in Benecia, offered music instruction from 1894 under Louis Lisser. By the 1930s it was an important centre for new music. American premières given by the department have included Berg's Lyrische Suite and a number of works by Milhaud, who taught at the college from 1940 to 1971. Other musicians and composers associated with the college have included Egon Petri, Luciano Berio and Leon Kirchner, as well as members of the Pro Arte quartet of Brussels. Among Milhaud's pupils at Mills were William Bolcom, Dave Brubeck, Steve Reich, Leland Smith, William O. Smith, Morton Subotnick and Richard Wernick. The Mills College Performing Group (active 1963–70) presented a considerable amount of new and unusual music, and the San Francisco Tape Music Center was moved to Mills in 1966. David Berstein succeeded Michelle Fillion as the head of the music department in 2000

The sarod master Ali Akbar Khan established the Ali Akbar College of Music in Marin County in 1967. The composer Lou Harrison taught and supervised the construction of gamelans at several colleges in the region, notably the San Jose campus of California State University.

The most important music collections in the Bay Area are at the University of California in Berkeley, the Oakland Public Library, Stanford University in Palo Alto, the San Francisco Public Library, San Francisco State University and the American Music Research Center at Dominican College in San Rafael. Music holdings can also be found at the San Francisco Conservatory, the California Historical Society and the Society of California Pioneers in San Francisco, at the Oakland Museum and at Mills College. The Archives for the Performing Arts (founded 1975, held at the opera house) is an important research collection of local materials and artefacts, and the Bay Area Music Archives contain recordings and materials relating to rock, jazz and popular music.

Sanger, David (John) (b London, 17 April 1947). English organist, teacher and composer. He studied the organ and the piano at the RAM from 1963 to 1966, and later received tuition from Lady Susi Jeans and Marie-Claire Alain. He made his London début in 1970, with recitals at the Proms and at the Royal Festival Hall (where he gave the first performance of Peter Racine Fricker's Ricercare). He has pursued a recital career ever since, giving meticulously researched and prepared performances over a broad repertory. A widely respected teacher, he has written two instructional volumes and has frequently served on the jury of major international organ competitions. He has acted as consultant for a number of new organs and for the restoration of the organ in the Usher Hall, Edinburgh.

Sanger has done extensive research on the organ symphonies of Vierne, attempting to correct the many errors attributed to the composer's poor eyesight, and has made a complete series of recordings. His sacred choral compositions include a Magnificat and Nunc Dimitis written for St Paul's Cathedral, a Mass for the Parishes and a Missa Brevis. He has also composed, edited and arranged works for organ solo.

IAN CARSON

Saṅgīta (Sanskrit: 'concerted song'). In India, the art of music, comprising vocal music (gīta), instrumental music (vādya) and dance (nṛtta). Of these, dance is based on music and instrumental music on vocal music; thus vocal music emerges as the primary art. The theorist Śārṅgadeva (13th century) structured the science of saṅgīta into seven divisions: melody (svara); mode (rāga); melodic elaboration and vocal ensembles (prakīrṇaka); vocal compositions (prabandha); metre (tāla); instruments and instrumental music (vādya); and dance (nṛtta) (see INDIA, §§III and IX). He asserted that the appreciation of music is natural to gods, men and animals, and its cultivation leads to the realization of the four ends of human existence: righteousness (dharma), wealth (artha), enjoyment (kāma) and liberation (mokṣa).

RICHARD WIDDESS

Sanglot (Fr.: 'sob'). A term used in the 18th and 19th centuries to refer to the expression of a sob or sigh, frequently on the word 'hélas'. The performance always includes either a sharp expulsion or intake of air (M. García, Traité complet de l'art du chant, 1840–47). Sometimes the exhalation of air is accompanied by a change in pitch from the principal note followed by a quick breath before accenting the following note (Montéclair, Principes de musique, 1736/R) creating a sobbing sound. An alternative 18th century term for the same effect is hélan (or élan).

Sang Tong [Zhu Jingqing] (b Songjiang, Jiangsu, 17 Jan 1923). Chinese composer. In the 1940s he was a Red Army officer and an activist in underground Communist Party circles. In Shanghai he became a music student of W. Fraenkel and J. Schloss, two former students of Schoenberg and Berg who had fled Nazi Germany. Under their guidance Sang developed a firm command of compositional techniques and a passion for Western atonal music. His piano piece From Far Away (1947) and his Night Scenery (1948) for violin and piano were the first and for several decades the only atonal works produced by a Chinese composer in the People's Republic. Under severe political pressure, he was forced to modify his idiom considerably. His Mongolian Folk Songs (1953) are reminiscent of Bartók's piano pieces for children, while Caprice (1959) for piano displays a Prokofievian brutality. Sang tried to resist the growing pressure of politics on musical life in Shanghai, but eventually lost his job as a music teacher at the conservatory (1955). During the Cultural Revolution he was tortured by Red Guards, resulting in partial deafness. By the 1980s, when it finally became possible for composers in China to pursue new directions in music, Sang had lost his creative powers. He was elected Director of the Shanghai Conservatory (1984–91) and became an influential writer on harmony and contemporary compositional theory. (KdG, Naixiong Liao)

San Juan, José de (d Madrid, ?1747). Spanish composer. He was a chorister at Sigüenza Cathedral under the direction of Benito Ambrona (1655–83). In his treatise 'Arte de cantollano', published in the Ceremonial dominicano (Madrid, 1694), he is named as maestro de novicios at S Tomas, Madrid. In 1708 he left the royal chapel in Madrid to become maestro de capilla of Sigüenza Cathedral, and by 1715 he was maestro de capilla at the monastery of the Descalzas Reales in Madrid, where he remained until 1741. His musical gifts were acknowledged by his contemporaries: in 1718 he acted as referee for Martín y Coll's Arte de cantollano y breve resumen de sus principales reglas (1729); Tomás de Iriarte placed him among the finest musicians in his poem La música, as also did Miguel de Landívar in his Laudatorio panegyrico-músico (1745); Antonio Rodriguez de Hita mentioned San Juan's word-setting as a model; and he was quoted in one of the pamphlets opposing Feijoo's 'Música en los templos' (Teatro critico universal, i, no.14). He also participated in the polemic surrounding the Misa 'Scala arentina' by Francisco Valls by publishing a Carta aprobatoria in which he refutes the attacks made on Valls by Joaquín Martínez, and by issuing on 17 February 1717 a Paracer ('Opinion') on this matter.

San Juan's own music comprises liturgical works, villancicos, oratorios, cantatas and theatre music (principal sources: E-E, MO, SA). His extant liturgical works are mostly for two choirs (typically SSAT, SATB) with instruments or basso continuo; they include three masses, an Office of the Dead (two lessons ed. H. Eslava, Lira sacro-hispana, Madrid, *c*1869), a Magnificat, hymns and psalm settings. The music of his three zarzuelas, Telémaco y Calipso (1723, Madrid), La enigma cómica (1723) and Eurotas y Diana (1729, Barcelona), is lost, and of his oratorios only one survives complete, Afectos de una alma reconocida al beneficio de su justificación en el exemplar de S María Magdalena, performed at the Congregación de S Felipe Neri, Palma de Mallorca, in 1715.

Sankey, Ira D(avid) (b Edinburg, PA, 28 Aug 1840; d Brooklyn, NY, 13 Aug 1908). American evangelistic singer, composer of gospel hymns, and hymnbook compiler. He rose to fame as music director for the evangelist Dwight L. Moody during a series of revival meetings held in England from 1873 to 1875. He popularized 'singing the gospel', in which he accompanied himself on a portable organ, performing the songs of Philip Phillips, Philip Bliss and William Bradbury, and making use of such effects as rubato and parlando delivery. He also directed the congregations in singing. Sankey became as effective a revivalist in song as was Moody in his sermons, elevating music to an equal role with preaching in evangelism.

In response to demands for the music used at their meetings, Sankey issued a 24-page pamphlet, Sacred Songs and Solos (London, 1873); this pamphlet eventually blossomed into a volume containing some 1200 pieces and sold more than 80 million copies. On his return to the USA Sankey merged his compilation with Bliss's Gospel Songs (1874) to produce Gospel Hymns and Sacred Songs (Cincinnati, 1875), which was followed by five more volumes (1876–91) and finally published as Gospel Hymns nos.1–6 Complete (1894/R). The series, to which Sankey contributed many of his own tunes, including those for the hymns The ninety and nine (1874), I'm praying for you (1875), Hiding in Thee (1877), A shelter in the time of storm (1885) and Faith is the victory (1891), helped to popularize the term 'gospel song'. From 1895 to his death Sankey was president of Biglow & Main, the publishing firm for many of his works.

Sanlecque [Senlecque], Jacques de (b Paris, 1614; d Paris, 23 Dec 1660). French type founder and printer. He was the third son of a type founder with the same first name (b Chaulnes, 1573; d Paris, 20 Nov 1648) and was his father's partner before taking over the business himself after the latter's death. Beginning in 1635, father and son created new musical fonts, taking the art of letter-cutting 'to the highest point of perfection then possible', as the type founder Pierre-Simon Fournier wrote 100 years later. The Sanlecques perfected three kinds of musical fonts, capable of adaptation to 'petite, moyenne et grosse musique'. 'These three fonts', wrote Fournier, 'are a masterpiece in the precision of the lines, the accuracy of the oblique lines linking the notes, and the perfection of their execution'.

On 11 February 1639 Jacques de Sanlecque the younger obtained from King Louis XIII 'the exclusive privilege of printing plainsong for ten years'. The granting of this privilege aroused the wrath of ROBERT BALLARD (iii), who considered himself the only person fit to enjoy a monopoly of music printing. Ballard took the Sanlecques to court, demanding that they cease all publication. The trial, which began in 1640, was a long one (the preliminary investigation lasted over eight years) and, if we are to believe Fournier, no decision was reached. Disregarding the lawsuit, Sanlecque continued manufacturing his fonts and using them to publish music; on 3 September 1655 he signed a contract with Etienne Moulinié, undertaking to print his compositions 'in a thousand copies', using the font for moyenne musique (Fournier). In 1658 Moulinié's Meslanges de sujets chrestiens, cantiques, litanies et motets came off his presses. After Sanlecque's death in 1660 his widow Marie-Manchon took over the business, and in the same year she published François Roberday's Fugues, et caprices, à quatre parties mises en partition pour l'orgue, in a print run of 500 copies.

According to Fournier, Jacques de Sanlecque also published a collection of his own compositions in 1637; it has not yet come to light.

Sanmartini [San Martino, Sammartini], Pietro (b Florence, 18 Sept 1636; d Florence, 1 Jan 1701). Italian composer, harpsichordist, organist and teacher. He was not related to Giuseppe and G.B. Sammartini. He was a pupil at the Florence music school run by G.B. Comparini and later became a priest. He worked as a musician in several places, including Rome, Bologna and Arezzo. From 1659 he lived permanently in Florence, working first as vicemaestro di cappella of the cathedral and as maestro from 21 June 1686 until his death. He also served the Medici court as a musician, principally as a lutenist and keyboard player. From 1692 he was a composing member of the Accademia Filarmonica of Bologna. He was much admired as a teacher. Very little of his considerable output of vocal and instrumental, sacred and secular music has survived, but it is enough to show that he was a competent composer. The last in particular of the ten sinfonias that comprise his op.2 is an important milestone in the development of the sonata da chiesa; indeed Cordara and others are probably right to regard him as an originator of the form that later grew into the symphony.

LUCRECIA R. KASILAG

Sanquirico, Alessandro (b Milan, 27 July 1777; d Milan, 12 March 1849). Italian scene painter and designer. He began his career designing scenery and decorating new theatres in conjunction with other leading artists such as Paolo Landriani, Giovanni Pedroni, Giovanni Perego and Giorgio Fuentes. From 1817 to 1832 he was sole designer and chief scene painter for La Scala. From this powerful position during a rich period of operatic output, he influenced design standards for the works of Bellini, Donizetti, Mozart, Meyerbeer, Rossini and many other later composers until well into the 20th century. Among the hundreds of operas and ballets he designed at La Scala were the premières of Rossini's La gazza ladra (1817), Bellini's Norma (1831) and Donizetti's Lucrezia Borgia (1833).

Sanquirico's designs were the foundation of the style commonly associated with 19th-century grand opera. They combined the restrained neo-classicism of his early training with the romantic trait of basing stage fantasy on historical accuracy and sensibility. Vast enough in scale to accommodate the epic quality of lyric drama, they were intimate enough and sufficiently 'realistic' to render human passions credible and reasonably natural. He tended to prefer spacious settings with single perspective, unlike the more intricate plans of the late Baroque period. A typical Sanquirico formula, widely copied and still theoretically valid, was to set a scene in a richly decorated architectural foreground which opened out on to a broad landscape view painted on a backdrop, profound in its simplicity (see illustration overleaf). This solved many technical problems of scale and, at the same time, satisfied the aesthetic needs of romantic audiences for spectacle. The end of his career saw the introduction of gas lighting in theatres, and his painted scenery showed a sensitivity to the nuances of light which later scene painters lost because of advances in lighting control. One reason for Sanquirico's international influence was that portfolios of hand-coloured engravings based on his theatrical and architectural drawings were published and extensively circulated and copied (Raccolta di scene teatrali eseguite o disegnate dai più celebri pittori scenici di Milano, 1819–24; Raccolta di varie decorazioni sceniche inventate ed eseguite per il R. Teatro alla Scala di Milano da Alessandro Sanquirico, *c*1827).

San Rafaele [San Raffaele], (Carlo Luigi Baldassare) Benvenuto Robbio, Count of (b Chieri, nr Turin, 25 June 1735; d Turin, 27 Feb 1797). Italian author, amateur violinist and composer. Because of the title-page of his sonatas op.2, he is sometimes erroneously called Benevento. He served as royal director of studies for Turin and was an honorary member of the Turin Academy of Painting and Sculpture. Burney called him 'a great performer on the violin, and a good composer', a judgment borne out by his compositions which are technically brilliant and tastefully written. Among a number of poetic and philosophical works, he wrote a short but valuable treatise on the violin and the relative merits of the schools of Corelli, Tartini and Stamitz.

Sanromano, Carlo Giuseppe (b Milan, *c*1630; d probably at Milan, after 1680). Italian composer and organist. Almost all the information about his life derives from Picinelli. He started studying music when he was 11 years old; at the age of 12 he became a treble at Milan Cathedral where he stayed for five years. He studied the organ and counterpoint with A.M. Turati and M.A. Grancini, maestri di cappella of the cathedral. At the age of 18 he became organist to the Celestine order. In 1650 he became organist of the collegiate church and teacher of grammar at Casorate, near Milan. In 1655 he returned to Milan as organist of S Babila; soon afterwards he became maestro di cappella of S Giovanni in Conca there. Having rejected an appointment as maestro di cappella of Vercelli Cathedral, he accepted the positions of organist and maestro di cappella of S Maria della Passione, Milan. In 1667 he also took up similar posts at S Maria presso S Celso. The title-page of his last publication shows that he still held his positions at S Maria della Passione in 1680. His compositions, all of them sacred, are written in the concertante style typical of the period. His motets consist of alternating recitatives and arias. Those for two voices include dialogues between Jesus and the soul, and so on, which were popular with Milanese composers at the time.

Sans, Juan Francisco (b Caracas, 1961). Venezuelan composer. He studied composition and piano at the Conservatorio Juan José Landaeta and the Juan Manuel Olivares School of Music in Caracas, later pursuing graduate work at the Central University of Venezuela. While still a young man he taught composition at the Landaeta Conservatory, and later was head of the music department at the Central University. In 1997 he was appointed director of the Vicente Emilio Sojo Foundation, the leading institute of musicological research in Venezuela.

He has refused to seek training outside his country, embracing instead the aesthetic of Vicente Emilio Sojo and the school of Caracas at a time when most composers of his generation travelled and trained extensively abroad. His style seeks to develop that of the Sojo school before 1960 and is based on Venezuelan traditional musical elements. His music is centred on tonality and is characterized by a conservative approach to form and instrumentation, but it often achieves notable grace and lyricism with tasteful nods towards minimalism and indigenous musical elements in his later works.

Sans also promotes his aesthetic views through his solo recitals and duo recitals with his wife Mariantonia Palacios and the double-bass player Luis Gómez-Imbert. He has presented the work of Latin American composers to Venezuelan audiences as a producer of the radio programme 'Compositores de America'.

Sanserre, Pierre. See SANTERRE, PIERRE.

Sanseverino, Benedetto (fl 1620–22). Italian guitarist, musician and composer. He was a musician at S Ambrosio Maggiore, Milan, when he published Intavolatura facile delli passacalli op.3 (Milan, 1620), a book of pieces for five-course Baroque guitar, which reappeared at Milan two years later as Il primo libro d'intavolatura per la chitarra alla spagnuola. It contains detailed instructions concerning the battute (strummed) style, and accompaniments to popular forms of the period such as the passacaglio, ciaccona, romanesca and saltarello; the 1622 edition also includes six canzonettas for which only the words and accompanimental chords are given. The prescribed tuning is g/G–c'/c–f/f–a/a–d'.

As Italian guitarists interpreted the Spanish style, they advocated chordal texture with an easy notation. Sanseverino adopted this style, advertising the 'easy tablature' on the title-page of his op.3. He was an innovator of guitar notation and chordal variation techniques. He notated shifted chords with new voicings and inversions; his rhythmic notation achieved a new standard of precision, revealing actual practices for the first time; and he advocated a popular style using full strums with the right hand. Sanseverino's opp.1 and 2 have not survived.

Sansoni [Samsony, Sambson, Sansone], Giovanni (b ?Venice, 1593; d Vienna, 15 Nov 1648). Italian cornett player and composer. In 1615 Romano Micheli called him 'musicus di Venezia'. In 1613 he became a cornett player at Archduke Ferdinand's court at Graz. When Ferdinand became emperor Sansoni moved to Vienna with the Graz court and spent the rest of his life there as a respected member of the court chapel. A court pay list from 1637 records him receiving nearly three times the salary of the next highest paid instrumentalist, Antonio Bertali. Sansoni had connections with Johann Georg I of Saxony, to whom he sent compositions in 1648, and with Schütz, who sent choirboys to him for instrumental training when their voices broke. In his Compositioni musicali (1645) G.A. Bertoli ranked Sansoni's standing as an authority 'nel Fagotto & nel Cornetto' as equal to that of Francesco Turini on the organ and Antonio Bertali on the violin. In his panegyric of contemporary music of 1647, G.B. Doni mentioned him beside Frescobaldi and Michelangelo Rossi. Sansoni's four surviving compositions suggest that he cultivated a variety of styles: the two motets from the Parnassus musicus Ferdinandaeus are unremarkable examples of the early few-voice motet with continuo; 'Laetentur coeli', with its alternation between polychoral and monodic sections, is reminiscent of the cantilena style pioneered by Giovanni Croce; while 'Beatus Antonius' is in the modern concertato style and features ritornellos for two obbligato violins.

Santa Croce, Francesco (b Padua, *c*1487; d Loreto, ?1556). Italian composer. The approximate date of his birth may be deduced from that of his ordination in 1512; his birthplace is known from certain documents which refer to him as 'Francesco Patavino'. He is mentioned as a singer at Padua Cathedral in 1511, where he seems to have remained until July 1512, when he was appointed maestro di cappella at the convent of S Francesco, Treviso. Documents show that he continued in this post until 1515. Having threatened to leave he was given a stipend increase in July, but this did not prevent him from resigning the following November. In 1520 he was maestro di cappella of Treviso Cathedral, where he remained until 1528, when he probably accepted a similar post at Chioggia. In 1531 he went to Udine, which he seems to have left in 1533. He finally returned to his former post at Treviso Cathedral in July 1537 and remained there until 1551. He perhaps may be identified with a canon of Loreto Cathedral who died in 1556.

Santa Croce is of some importance as a composer of church music. He was one of the earliest composers to use cori spezzati; he probably learnt double-choir writing from Fra Ruffino d'Assisi in Padua. The ten manuscript psalm settings (in I-TVd) show that he was well aware of the possibilities in writing for these forces. Instead of the traditional imitative counterpoint found in many Italian compositions of the early 16th century, Santa Croce used homophonic textures and simple harmonies. His music is particularly interesting for its use of short phrases, with each choir singing only two or three bars before being interrupted by the other. Willaert, who started the vogue for cori spezzati, may have known his music and Santa Croce's treatment of the double choir is similar to the technique which was later to form the basis of Andrea Gabrieli's style.

Santa Cruz, Antonio de (*fl c*1700). Spanish vihuelist, guitarist and composer. He wrote the elegantly illustrated Libro donde se veran pazacalles de los ocho tonos i de los trasportados (E-Mn M.2209), copied for 'Don Juan de Miranda', possibly the court painter Juan Carreño de Miranda (1614–85; see Esses). The music, which is prefaced by advice on how to play cleanly and a chart of the Italian alfabeto chords, includes traditional Spanish dance types and 11 passacalles arranged by key according to the alfabeto system, and ends with a fantasía and passacalles in scordatura (using the same tuning that Francesco Corbetta adopted for his suite published in 1648) and a torneo, or battle piece. The watermark and certain notational idiosyncrasies (similar to those in E-Mn M.811) suggest a date between about 1690 and 1710. Santa Cruz's title-page states that the book is for 'biguela hordinaria', but it is clear that his instrument had five courses and the same tuning as the contemporary guitar. Chords rarely have more than three notes and nearly all passages are plucked – a style preferred also by Francisco Guerau in his Poema harmónico (Madrid, 1694). The music shuns the bell-like campanelas favoured by Gaspar Sanz and Santiago de Murcia, resembling more that of Guerau, which probably made use of bordones (bass strings). Ornamentation is prevalent, with notated trills, slow and quick slurs and vibrato. Tonalities are indicated by both the alfabeto and the Catalan numerical systems, a feature associated also with Francesc Valls and Sanz, and one which suggests that Santa Cruz, like them, may have been from north-east Spain.

CRAIG H. RUSSELL

Santa Cruz (Wilson), Domingo (b La Cruz, Valparaiso, 5 July 1899; d Santiago, 6 Jan 1987). Chilean composer and administrator. He was the leader of Chilean musical life from the early 1920s until the late 1960s.

1. LIFE. He studied composition privately with Soro in Santiago (1917–21) and graduated in law from the University of Chile (1921). While serving as secretary to the Chilean Embassy in Spain (1921–4) he continued private composition studies with del Campo (1922–4). In 1927 he left the diplomatic service and turned his attention to music. He had already in 1917 organized a choral group, the Bach Society, which gave the first performance of his Te Deum op.4 in 1919, but it was only after his return from Europe in 1924 that the choir began a period of intense public activity that lasted until its disbandment in 1932. With this ensemble Santa Cruz introduced to Chilean audiences the repertory of Renaissance polyphony and also such major works as Bach's Christmas Oratorio (in 1925). The society was active not only in the field of performance: they opened their own conservatory, initiated the music magazine Marsyas (1927) and took a leading role in the reorganization and advancement of musical life in Chile.

In 1928 Santa Cruz was asked by the Secretary of Education to take part in the reform of the National Conservatory, which he then joined as professor of history and analysis, a post he retained until 1953. He established the faculty of fine arts in 1930, thus transferring control of the conservatory from the Ministry of Education to the University of Chile. Appointed acting dean of the faculty in 1932, he was elected dean in 1933 and successively re-elected to the post until 1951 (in 1948 the faculty had been split, so that Santa Cruz had charge only of the music department); he was again dean from 1962 to 1968. His achievements during these years were considerable: he founded the Asociación Nacional de Conciertos Sinfónicos under the direction of Carvajal (1931–8), the Institute of Secondary Education to provide an arts training for all faculty students (1933), the Revista de arte (1934–42), the National Association of Composers (1936, from 1948 the Chilean section of the ISCM), the Departamento de Extensión Artistica at the University of Chile (1939), the Instituto de Extensión Musical (1941, Santa Cruz was its director until 1953), the Revista musical chilena (1945), the Institute of Musical Research (1946), the Chilean music festivals and competitions (1948), the Chilean section of the IMC (1953), the Inter-American Institute for Music Education (1960), the Chilean Music Council (1963), the radio station IEM (1967) and the Academy of Fine Arts of the Instituto de Chile (1967). As senior dean in 1944 he was appointed vice-rector of the University of Chile.

Apart from his leading role in the development of Chilean culture, Santa Cruz was active internationally as a conference member, administrator and adjudicator. He was elected vice-president (1953) and president (1955) of the ISME, president of the IMC (1956) and president of the Inter-American Music Council (1963), and in 1964 he was appointed to the Council of Higher Education in the American Republics. In 1960 he taught as Mellon Distinguished Professor at the Carnegie Institute of Technology in Pittsburgh. Among the awards he received were honorary membership and the title of professor emeritus in the music faculty of the University of Chile (1953), the decoration of officer of the Légion d'honneur (1958) and membership of the Argentine Academy of Fine Arts. He held a Rockefeller Scholarship (1956–7) and a Guggenheim Fellowship (1970–71), and he received numerous prizes and commissions.

2. WORKS. Santa Cruz's activity as a composer began in 1917, but little is known of the music he composed before 1925. The Viñetas op.8 for piano (1925–7) and the Cantos de soledad op.10 (1928) already show certain stylistic features which, in spite of the significant subsequent evolution, have remained characteristic. These include a leaning towards a very terse and dramatic harmonic idiom, a highly chromatic linearity, luxuriant counterpoint and textural density. There is also a lack of concern for instrumental colour, and he has avoided virtuoso writing for instruments. To a large extent his work is rooted in the music of the 16th-century contrapuntists and in the fugal style of Bach, yet an important place is left for melodic and rhythmic traits that are purely Spanish in origin and are equally evident in choral pieces, string quartets and orchestral works. The linear chromaticism of his music links him with Hindemith, yet his Latin background is consistently affirmed.

Santa Fe Opera Company. Organization founded in New Mexico in 1957 which gives a summer opera season. Under its founder and general director, John Crosby, the company has presented a repertory of familiar works, revivals of rarely performed operas and contemporary works. It has given premières of Marvin David Levy's The Tower (1957), Carlisle Floyd's Wuthering Heights (1958), Berio's Opera (1970), Villa-Lobos's Yerma (1971), Rochberg's The Confidence Man (1982), John Eaton's The Tempest (1985) and David Lang's Modern Painters (1995), as well as American premières of operas by Berg, Janáček, Menotti, Penderecki, Shostakovich, Weir and Wingrave. Many of the singers are American and the orchestra is drawn from major symphony orchestras in the USA. Operas are staged in an open-air theatre (rebuilt in 1998). Apprentice artists (young people selected by national auditions) fill minor roles and sing in the chorus, and a technicians' apprentice programme allows students to participate in production and stage management. The company provides educational outreach programmes to elementary schools throughout the state and to the northern New Mexico Amerindian pueblos.

Sant'Agata, Tommaso da (fl 1636). Italian composer. He was a Franciscan friar of the Observant order. In 1617 he was vicar-general and procurator of his order for the duchy of Urbino. After the last member of the ruling Della Rovere family had died and Urbino had been annexed to the church, he moved, in about 1636, to Rome, where he held similar positions. He published Motecta … liber primus (Rome, 1636) for one to three voices, the volume also including a simple, but well wrought three-part mass, one of the handful of examples for fewer than four voices. Eight further solo motets by him appear in an anthology (RISM 1636[3]; repr. in 1637[1]). His monodic motets, which form the bulk of his output, are on occasion both exceptionally tuneful and daringly chromatic. According to Fétis he also published Regulae breves et faciles cantus ecclesiastici (Urbino, 1617), but there is no trace of it now. (G. Dixon: Liturgical Music in Rome 1605–45, diss., U. of Durham, 1982, pp.218–19)

Santamaría, Mongo [Ramón] (b Havana, 7 April 1927). Cuban percussionist, bandleader, composer and arranger. He first began to learn the violin, but switched to percussion as a child. He left Cuba in 1948, moving to Mexico with his cousin, the bongo player Armando Peraza. They played in Pérez Prado's mambo band, then moved to New York City in 1950, where they were known as the Black Cuban Diamonds. Santamaría soon found work with Tito Puente, working in the band for seven years alongside percussionist Willie Bobo. During this time he recorded various albums of authentic Cuban religious and secular drumming, both with Puente and under his own name. With Bobo he left to join Cal Tjader's Latin jazz group in 1958. In 1961 Santamaría put together a charanga ensemble, and recorded with the Cuban vocalist La Lupe in 1963, helping to launch her US career. By the mid-1960s he turned to the Latin crossover vein, with widely popular hits such as Watermelon Man and a version of Afro-Blue. He returned to more traditional sounds during the 1970s, recording the salsa classic Ubané with the vocalist Justo Betancourt (1976) and also releasing several Latin jazz albums. One of the most famous Latin percussionists in the USA, he has remained active through the 1990s.

LISE WAXER

Santa Maria, Salvatore (fl 1620–28). Italian composer. A Benedictine monk, he received holy orders at the monastery of S Giustina, Padua, and was working at Este, near Padua, in the years in which his main publications appeared. These were two volumes of motets: Sacrorum concentuum … libro primo, for one to five voices and organ (Venice, 1620), also including a four-part mass, and Sacrorum concentuum … libro secondo, for one to four and six voices with organ (Venice, 1628), also including four-part litanies. Both are written in the modern concertato style that had become well established in northern Italy. The motets of 1620 have interesting bass lines over which extended vocal melodies are unfolded: in the four-part Domine exaudi they are decorated by specified trillo ornaments and combine to produce curiously dissonant part-writing of a kind associated with English Restoration church music. The mass, unlike many that were still in the old polyphonic style at this date, is also in the concertato idiom, though it is undistinguished. The 1628 book contains several motets with sinfonias for two violins. There are also two motets by Santa Maria in an anthology (RISM 1629[5]). (J. Roche: North Italian Church in the Age of Monteverdi, Oxford, 1984)

JEROME ROCHE/ELIZABETH ROCHE

Santa María, Tomás de [Sancta Maria, Thomas de] (b Madrid; d ?Ribadavia, northwest Spain, 1570). Spanish theorist and composer. He became a friar in the Dominican order at S María de Atocha, Madrid, on 11 March 1536 and served as organist in various Dominican monasteries in Castilla. There is no evidence to support Villalbla's supposition that Santa María resided at the monastery of S Pablo in Valladolid.

He is known for his treatise on instrumental technique, composition and improvisation, Arte de tañer fantasía (Valladolid, 1565/R; Eng. trans., 1991), which, as stated in the title-page and prologue, was examined and approved by the royal organists Antonio and Juan de Cabezón. Apparently begun in 1541, the work was first licensed in 1557; however, its publication was delayed by a paper shortage. It was re-licensed in 1563 and was finally published in Valladolid in 1565. Concerned mainly with the clavichord, its aim was to teach the playing of fantasias (i.e. how to improvise pieces in imitative style). Part i presents the rudiments of music (in the first 12 chapters) and keyboard technique; part ii the harmonic, contrapuntal and structural procedures. Chapters 13 to 19 constitute the earliest detailed treatment of keyboard technique, including hand position, touch, articulation, fingering (a surprisingly progressive approach using all five fingers), the two ornaments, redoble and quiebro, and the use of 'pointed', or dotted style. In chapters 20 to 23 the performance of composed works and the application of 'glosa' or diminution is discussed. Part i concludes with detailed treatment of the eight church modes, both natural and transposed, the 'seculorums' (psalm tones) and the cadence types.

Chapters 1 to 30 of part ii constitute a systematic approach to harmony. After a brief treatment of dissonances, Santa María concentrated on 'consonancias', meaning not only intervals but also four-note chords. He classified them according to outer and internal intervals, and degrees of sonority, systematically applying them to the harmonization of various note values and melodic progressions, including the fabordones. In these chapters, Santa María presented a technique of chordal improvisation, 'playing in consonances', based on the supremacy of a treble-bass duet filled in with vertical sonorities, which in turn were defined by intervals counted from the bass upward. This amounts to an early formulation of the same principle which in the 17th century resulted in the familiar thoroughbass technique. In chapters 31 to 51 he gave procedures for constructing four-part imitative pieces, with emphasis on voice-pairing techniques. The work concludes with advice to beginners, and instructions for tuning the clavichord and vihuela. There are many music examples throughout in a type of vocal notation in which each part has its own staff and clef without barring or alignment. The examples range from brief progressions to complete pieces of 40 to 75 bars (called 'exemplos', not 'fantasías') featuring imitative polyphony in a simple style resembling Cabezón's tientos, but considerably less varied.

Santa María's text is filled with pedantic repetition and elaboration on the obvious – doubtless the product of a scholastic education – but the work is masterful for its clarity and systematic organization and seems wholly original. It provides a practical and pedagogical survey applied to keyboard improvisation of the same genres, structural principles and compositional techniques which are found in works of composers such as Antonio de Cabezón. Later theorists rarely mentioned Santa María, but several, including Artufel, Cerone and Lorente, extensively plagiarized his work.

ALMONTE HOWELL/MIGUEL A. ROIG-FRANCOLI

Santana, Carlos (b Autlán de Navarro, Mexico, 20 July 1947). American pop bandleader and guitarist. He was the son of a Mexican immigrant to the USA who played mariachi violin. He formed the Santana Blues Band in San Francisco before renaming the band Santana and developing the Latin-rock synthesis on three albums issued between 1969 and 1971: Santana, Abraxas and III. His group was the first to achieve a fusion of Latin polyrhythms and rock guitar playing, and the core of its sound was the interlocking percussive work of Jose Chepito Areas, Mike Shreive and Michael Carabello set against Santana's own soaring guitar lines and the bass playing of David Brown along with keyboard player Greg Rolie's throaty vocals. Among their best known works from this period are the instrumental pieces Toussaint l'ouverture and Batuka, Santana's version of the Fleetwood Mac song Black Magic Woman, and the group's anthem Soul Sacrifice, the highlight of Santana's performance at the 1969 Woodstock Festival. During the 1970s, Santana broadened his range to include jazz-rock recordings with drummer Billy Cobham, guitarist John McLaughlin and others, notably the album Love, Devotion, Surrender (1973). He continued to perform and record into the 1990s and his was one of the three ensembles which played at both the original and 1994 Woodstock Festivals.

DAVE LAING

Sant'Anna [Sá Bacon], José Pereira de (b Rio de Janeiro, 4 Feb 1696; d Salvaterra, Portugal, 31 Jan 1759). Portuguese writer on music. Before becoming a calced Carmelite his name was José Pereira de Sá Bacon. He studied at Olinda (Brazil) and at Coimbra, there obtaining the doctorate in theology on 17 May 1725. After several years as sub-prior at Olinda he returned to Coimbra as a professor and royal family confessor. An excellent singer and composer of sacred music, he included important data on the history of Carmelite music in Portugal in his two-volume Chronica dos Carmelitas (Lisbon, 1745–51) and Dissertação apologetica (Lisbon, 1751). ROBERT STEVENSON

Santavalla, Angel Custodio [González] (b Braga, 5 July 1750; d Mondoñedo, 15 Dec 1804). Portuguese composer and organist. He was principal organist at Tuy Cathedral, where he seems to have received his musical training, and where, after serving as a choirboy, he studied the violin, organ and composition. From 1769 he was taken on provisionally as an organist, but on feast days played the violin and was responsible for the tuning and care of the organs. In 1774 he spent six months in Madrid, supported by the chapter, to continue studying the organ. After applying unsuccessfully in 1775 for the post of maestro de capilla at León, on 14 June 1782 he started work as maestro de capilla at Mondoñedo Cathedral, where he had already been appointed sub-deacon, and was later ordained priest; he was to remain as maestro de capilla until his death in 1804. Santavalla inherited a well-established and flourishing chapel from his predecessor Joaquín Lázaro. His music is clearly distanced from the traditional juxtaposition of old and new styles found in the works of previous cathedral composers. He employed a Classical musical language both in his Latin settings and in his villancicos, which contain some of his most interesting music. The use of sung parts in Galician for the priest among the villancico repertory is a device which Santavalla borrowed from the composer Melchor López Giménez, by whom he was strongly influenced. Of his works (mostly in E-MON) 530 items have been catalogued, including some works dating from his time at Tuy: 12 masses, antiphons, psalms, lamentations, villancicos for major feast days, and various secular songs, trios and Italian arias.

CARLOS VILLANUEVA

Santerre [Sanserre, Senterre, Senserre], Pierre (d Poitiers, before 1567). French composer. In 1555 he served as cathedral organist in Poitiers, and his major work, a collection of settings for four voices of the 150 Psalms, appeared there in 1567. In a prefatory note, the printer Nicolas Logerois pointed out that the publication was posthumous. Although one partbook of this collection was known in the 19th century, there is no trace of it today.

Nine four-voice chansons by Santerre survive in anthologies printed by Attaingnant, Du Chemin and Le Roy & Ballard. Several are designated 'chansons poitevines', suggesting that they may reflect local colour. Measured against the norm of Parisian chanson style, Santerre's music seems somewhat eccentric. In place of the continuity of phrase structure characteristic of the Parisian chanson, he provided a choppy, spasmodic design, in which short motifs interact with one another. The texts are set syllabically to sprightly rhythms and animated melodies with extensive use of repeated notes. The pieces designated 'poitevine' are long, rambling, multi-sectional compositions; one in particular, the Procès de Tallebot, uses a poetic dialect from Poitiers.

Santi, Nello (b Adria, Rovigo, 22 Sept 1931). Italian conductor. He studied at the Liceo Musicale, Padua, and made his début at the Teatro Verdi there in 1951 with Rigoletto. Since 1958 he has conducted regularly at the Zürich Opera, and has made his home in the city. He made his Covent Garden début in 1960 with La traviata, and the same year appeared at the Vienna Staatsoper and at Salzburg; he has since conducted at all the major international houses, making his Metropolitan début in 1962 with Un ballo in maschera. He was chief conductor of the Basle RSO from 1986, and in 1988 he conducted Aida at the Earl's Court Exhibition Centre as London's first 'arena opera'. Santi has worked almost exclusively in the Italian operatic mainstream from Rossini to Puccini; his performances are distinguished by grace, propulsion and the ability to obtain fine artistic responses from singers and orchestra. His recordings include Maria Stuarda, Manon Lescaut, Pagliacci and Montemezzi's L'amore dei tre re.

NOËL GOODWIN

Santiago. Capital city of Chile. From the early colonial period churches held festivities honouring the Virgin and saints, in which a mixture of folk music (African, Amerindian and Spanish) and Spanish religious songs alternated with the use of plainchant. By the mid-18th century the former had been forbidden and art music by the Spaniards Soler and Pons and by the Italians Porpora, Pergolesi and Paisiello prevailed. French influence grew during the 18th century. Certain genres of salon dances were popular, but church music was also cultivated with distinction by such appointees to the Metropolitan Cathedral as the Spaniards Cristóbal Ajuria and José de Campderrós, and later the Peruvian José B. Alzedo y Larrain.

Independence completely changed the city's cultural life. Secular music widened its repertory from earlier imitations of French salon dances to copies of European display pieces, accomplished by a host of native composers of very basic skills. By far the most popular form was opera; musical life was dominated by the influences of Rossini, Donizetti, Bellini, Mercadante and later of Verdi and the most italianate French composers. The first attempts to present an opera season, in 1830, developed into regular seasons in 1844 at the Teatro de la Universidad, the auditorium of the Royal University of S Felipe (founded 1744). In 1853 the opera moved to the Teatro de la República, remaining there until the new Teatro Municipal was inaugurated in 1857 with Verdi's Ernani. It burnt down in 1870; a replacement was inaugurated in 1873. In 1895 the Municipal gave the première of the first opera by a Chilean, Eliodoro Ortiz de Zárate's La florista de Lugano. Opera seasons alternated there with zarzuelas, ballets, orchestral concerts, and recitals by Chilean and visiting performers. However, the first permanent ensembles were not established in this house until the 1950s, the best-known being the Orquesta Filarmónica founded in 1955 by Juan Matteucci, its permanent conductor until 1963, and the Ballet Municipal (1955).

In 1819 a pioneering attempt to develop chamber music beyond the private circles of the upper class, instigated by the Danish amateur cellist Carlos Dretwetcke, led to the establishment of the Sociedad Filarmónica (1827–95), the Sociedad de Música Clásica (1879–83) and the Sociedad del Cuarteto (1886–90). Their public concerts were supplemented by those of the Conservatorio Nacional de Música (1849), which maintained a small orchestra and chorus. Performances of Verdi's Requiem (1890) and Handel's Messiah (1896) were given in Santiago. The Sociedad Orquestal (1912–14), in spite of the success of its first presentation of Beethoven's nine symphonies under Nino Marcelli in 1913, did not continue after its conductor's departure for Europe. Many efforts to organize continued concert seasons were finally realized in the 1920s by the Sociedad Bach (1917–32), which emerged as a powerful force for change in Santiago's musical life. It promoted the reform of specialized education in music and its incorporation into the university (see CHILE), and laid the groundwork for a regular concert life. The Asociación Nacional de Conciertos Sinfónicos (1931–8) led to the establishment of the Orquesta Sinfónica de Chile (1941) by Armando Carvajal, its artistic director until 1947, when he was succeeded by Victor Tevah. The Instituto de Extensión Musical (1941), part of the University of Chile, sponsored this orchestra and many other ensembles which raised the standard and quantity of events of Santiago's musical life to a level comparable to that of the most important cities of Latin America.

Choral singing has developed extensively since the establishment of the Orfeo Catalá (1913). The universities have several proficient groups, such as those of the Universidad Católica (1938), the Universidad de Chile (1945) and the Universidad Técnica (1952), as do individual communities such as the German Singkreis (1942). Choral groups are also active at the Universidad de Santiago and the Universidad Metropolitana de Ciencias de la Educacíon. The work of the universities in training performers and raising musical standards has been supplemented effectively by various private academies; among the best is the Escuela Moderna de Música (1940). Similarly many organizations have shared with the University of Chile and the Teatro Municipal the maintaining of a high level of concert activity in Santiago. In the field of contemporary music the Sociedad Nueva Música (1946–8), the Asociación Nacional de Compositores (1950–58) and the Agrupación Tonus (1954–9) have offered representative seasons. The Catholic University maintained the Orquesta de Cámara (1961), conducted by its artistic director Fernando Rosas and guest conductor Juan Pablo Izquierdo; the Cuarteto Santiago was founded in 1956. Other concert-promoting bodies include the Sociedad Mozart (1947–54), the bi-national cultural centres, particularly the Goethe Institute (since 1955) and the Mozarteum (1968). The Ancient Instruments Ensemble (1954) has given consistently good performances of pre-Baroque and Ibero-American colonial music.

Festivals in Santiago are the Chilean Music Festival (1948–69, partially resumed in 1979 and 1998), the Choral Festival sponsored by the Music Educators Association (from 1950) and the Contemporary Music Festival of the Catholic University (from 1968). Between 1984 and 1989 the Agrupación Musical Anacrusa played an important role in the performance of contemporary music. The Ensemble Bartók has been active since 1983.

Santiago, Francisco (b Santa Maria, Bulacan, 29 Jan 1889; d Manila, 28 Sept 1947). Filipino composer, conductor and pianist. Showing precocious musical talent, he was taken to Manila at the age of ten to train at the Colegio de Tiples of the Cathedral. He studied the piano with Echegoyen, Villacorta and Calzada, and then entered the S Juan de Letran College and later the University of the Philippines Conservatory, where he took teacher's diplomas in the piano (1921) and composition (1922). For a while he taught at the university and composed: he had written his first song in the kundiman genre, Ako'y anak ng dalita ('I'm a Poor Child'), in 1917, and he produced the harmonizations for Filipino Folk Songs (Manila, 1921, 2/1950), a collection made by Emilia S. Cavan. Santiago then continued his education in Chicago at the American Conservatory (MMus 1924) and the Musical College (DMus 1924). On his return to Manila he was appointed assistant professor of piano and composition at the University of the Philippines Conservatory, and he became its first native Filipino director in 1931, holding that post until the outbreak of World War II. As a composer he was a classicist and a great melodist; the Piano Concerto has passages of Lisztian bravura, but the songs are full of a pastoral simplicity of sentiment.

LUCRECIA R. KASILAG

Santiago, Francisco de [Veiga, Vega] (b Lisbon, *c*1578; d Seville, 5 Oct 1644). Portuguese composer, active in Spain. Under his family name, Veiga, he was engaged as maestro de capilla of Plasencia Cathedral on 16 February 1596, when he was apparently 18. In March he was rebuked for starting motets too soon at festal Masses, and on 15 July, having incurred the displeasure of an important canon, he was dismissed. In 1601, however, the cathedral chapter invited him to take part in special Holy Week services. By 14 May of that year he had joined the calced Carmelites at Madrid and thereafter was known as Francisco de Santiago. He may have studied with Nicolas Dupont in Madrid, for his Missa 'Ego flos campi' is based on a motet by that composer. From 1601 to 1617 he was maestro de capilla of the rich and influential calced Carmelite house at Madrid. On 11 January 1617 the Seville Cathedral chapter invited him to become maestro de capilla, and he assumed the post on 5 April. Loyal to his compatriots, he immediately recruited as his chief singer and aide the Lisbon-born contralto Manuel Corrêa do Campo.

Santiago was the first to bring castratos to Seville, three on 11 May 1620, seven before 1635; they joined an already rich establishment of singers and players. According to the chronicler Castro Palacios, 'Santiago in his humble white friar's habit made a strange sight conducting all this lavish panoply'. From 1619 to 1623 and from 9 February 1628 to 31 December 1635 he was responsible, in addition to his other duties, for the instruction of the cathedral seises, who were employed in principal roles in the coloquios or musical playlets, given each year at Corpus Christi. He was allowed a long leave every five years to visit Lisbon. In 1640 he was given two months' leave in order to visit the baths at Caldas da Rainha for his sciatica; the cure was paid for by his patron the Duke of Bragança, who that year became King João IV.

Santiago's eight-part responsories remained in use at Seville Cathedral until at least 1772, but it was his villancicos which enjoyed the greatest popularity at Seville and also in Spanish America.

ROBERT STEVENSON

Santiago de Compostela. Cathedral city in north-west Spain. Santiago Cathedral was one of the most important shrines for pilgrimage during the Middle Ages. Built over the grave of St James, patron saint of Spain, the present structure was begun in 1078 and represents classic Spanish romanesque architecture. The pilgrimages left their mark on the music of the cathedral and, according to the 12th-century Calixtinus manuscript (E-SC; see SOURCES, MS, §IV), > it is a source of wonder and gladness to see the choirs of pilgrims in perpetual vigil by the venerable altar of Santiago: Teutons in one place, Franks in another, Italians in another.... Some play the cittern, others lyres, kettledrums, flutes, flageolets, trumpets, harps, violins, British or Welsh crwths, some singing with citterns, others accompanied of divers instruments.

It is the only surviving document of medieval music there; further documentation of musical life appears only in the 16th century.

The first maestro de capilla, Lorenzo Durán, was appointed in 1526 and the musical chapel, which employed professional singers and boy choristers, dates from that time; records that document the singing of Flemish polyphony are older, going back to the mid-15th century. Four ministriles (reed players) became permanent members of the chapel consort from 1539. The most important maestros de capilla in the 16th century were Alonso Ordóñez, Francisco Logroño and Andrés de Villalar.

The number of singers and ministriles greatly increased during the 17th century when polychoral music became predominant. This development culminated in the works of José de Vaquedano who frequently wrote for 12 voices (three choruses) and sometimes for 16 or more voices. Other important maestros de capilla in the 17th century were Jerónimo Vicente, Diego Pontac and Diego Verdugo.

During the 18th century polychoral styles and counterpoint gave way to the Italian style; this is seen most clearly in the works of Buono Chiodi, an Italian who was formerly maestro di cappella at Bergamo and who came to Santiago Cathedral in 1769. Other notable 18th-century maestros de capilla were Antonio de Yanguas, Diego de las Muelas, Pedro Rodrigo and Pedro Cifuentes. Even before Chiodi's time some of the best cathedral singers in Santiago were Italian. Two splendid 18th-century organs still stand, though much restored, on either side of the choir. Chiodi's successor was Melchor López Jiménez, whose 38 years as maestro de capilla saw a steady evolution towards Classicism, and whose works are models of correctness and religious inspiration. During his tenure the cathedral orchestra reached full size, while the vocal complement remained a double chorus (eight voices) with frequent recourse to solos, duos etc.

The 19th-century maestros de capilla were Ramón Palacio, Juan Trallero, José Alfonso and Santiago Tafall Abad, all of them composers, as were some of the organists of this period. After the government's confiscation of church property in the mid-19th century, musical activity in the cathedral began to decline, but a small chorus and orchestra were kept until the mid-20th century, when the orchestra was reorganized. 20th-century maestros de capilla have included Manuel Soler, Mariano Pérez Gutiérrez and Nemesio García Carril. The chirimías (Spanish shawms) still accompany the solemn processions, and Santiago is the only place where these ancient precursors of the oboe can be heard.

Opera was brought to Santiago in the second half of the 18th century by the Italian singer and impresario Antonio Settaro; during the 19th century opera continued to enjoy great popularity, as did the Spanish zarzuela. In the 20th century such interest decayed, but from 1990 musical life gained a new vitality thanks to the construction of a large auditorium, where the best orchestras and soloists are heard, as well as regular opera seasons.

Santiago University library contains Fernando I's mozarabic manuscript (1055). Música en Compostela, a summer course given annually from mid-August to mid-September, was founded by Andrés Segovia and José Miguel Ruiz Morales in 1958, and offers instruction in performance and composition.

Santiago de Cuba. City on the southern coast of Cuba. Its cathedral was founded in 1522, and in 1544 the mestizo Miguel Velázquez was maestro de capilla. Because of French privateers in 1553, assault by British troops in 1662 and an earthquake in 1675, no early sources of music from Santiago survive. Domingo de Flores was appointed cathedral music director when the capilla was re-established in 1682, among his successors the most important composers were the Havana-born Esteban Salas y Castro (1725–1803; maestro 1764–1803) and the Santiago-born Cratilio Guerra (1834–96; maestro 1866–9 and 1875–8). The first Santiago imprint was the text of the Christmas villancicos set by Salas in 1793; in 1961 the cathedral music archive of 158 works still contained 46 of his festive vernacular works dated between 1783 and 1800. He also composed an extensive Latin repertory. Juan Nicolás de Villavicencio was cathedral organist from 1759 to 1779; his successor, Diego Hierrezuelo, was trained by Salas. In 1812 Juan París (1759–1845) succeeded Salas.

In the 1790s French planters who had fled from Saint-Domingue (now Haiti) founded the first theatre for opera production in the Calle de Santo Tomás; Grétry's Zémire et Azor was produced there on 19 March 1800, followed by other operas from the contemporary French repertory. The Coliseo de Marina y Barracones served as the town theatre from 1823 to 1844. In 1851 the Teatro de la Reina opened, with a season including Norma, Lucia di Lammermoor and Ernani; in the same year Mozart's Requiem was sung in the cathedral for the first time, with an orchestra of 60 and a chorus of 42.

The Sociedad Filarmónica de Isabel II, active from 1832 to 1844, was succeeded in 1845 by the more prestigious Sociedad Filarmónica de Cuba. Laureano Fuentes Matons (1825–98), the leading 19th-century composer and music historian born in Santiago, played the Carnaval de Venecia at the inaugural concert of the latter society on 5 August 1846. His one-act opera La hija de Jefte (to a libretto by Antonio Arnao) was the first opera by a native Cuban performed in Cuba.

Gottschalk gave five triumphant concerts at Santiago in 1854, cooperating, as was his custom in Latin America, with leading local artists. In that same year a Spanish touring company gave five zarzuelas, beginning with Hernando's El duende on 18 July. Gottschalk returned with Adelina Patti in 1857. José White, the leading Cuban violin virtuoso of the 19th century, gave his first Santiago recital on 5 March 1860, and returned to play in the Teatro Principal on 20 February 1875 and 9 January 1879.

Apart from those already named, the main local composers in Santiago before 1940 were Francisco Hierrezuelo (1763–1824), Silvano Boudet (1825–63), Rafael Salcedo (1844–1917), Ramón Figueroa (1862–1928) and Rodolfo Hernández (1856–1937). In 1961 works by all of these were available for study in the Museo Municipal 'Emilio Bacardí Moreau', founded in 1899 by the magnate Bacardí (1844–1922). Among Santiago-born composers active during Castro's epoch, Harold Gramatges (b 1918) studied at Tanglewood with Copland, served in 1961–5 as Cuban ambassador in France, and in 1966 organized the music section of the Casa de las Américas. From 1962 Santiago was the seat of the annual Festival Nacional de Coros.

Santiago de Cuba and surrounding regions have been widely influential in the development of dynamic forms of traditional and popular music. Musical influences brought to the area by refugees of the Haitian revolution in the 1790s eventually led to the development of the Cuban contradanza, danza and danzón, with their characteristic cinquillo rhythms. These genres (especially the danzón) emerged during struggles for independence from Spain in the 19th century and are considered to be the first forms of national musical expression in Cuba. Performers of Afro-Haitian ancestry have perpetuated other styles of music derived from Haiti as well, most notably the tumba francesa. The influence of light opera on the working classes of Santiago is evident in their performances of vieja trova, a major musical force at the turn of the century that contributed to the emergence of the bolero and related forms throughout Latin America. Composer and guitarist José 'Pepe' Sánchez (1856–1918) was crucial to this process, reinterpreting the triple-metre Spanish bolero in a slower 2/4 time and influencing the artistic development of younger trovadores such as Sindo Garay, Rosendo Ruiz and Manuel Corona.

Santiago's carnival band traditions are arguably the most vibrant on the island, incorporating unique percussive rhythms and instruments such as the corneta china, a loud double-reed instrument brought to the island by Chinese indentured servants. Santiago's carnivals take place during the summer months, as opposed to those celebrated in Havana, and have been held every year despite the widespread economic difficulties experienced since 1989. Finally, the Cuban son, the most popular form of musical expression on the island since the 1920s, also developed in the Santiago area. Originally a regional genre associated with Afro-Cuban farmers, the son became popular throughout the island from the second decade of the 20th century. A highly syncretic form of expression that manifests both African- and Spanish-derived stylistic traits, it has become a central metaphor for national identity. Rhythms and percussion patterns derived from the son have been the seminal force behind the emergence of the mambo, modern salsa and Latin jazz. In terms of its international influence, son from the Santiago area is one of the most significant musical forms to have emerged in the 20th century.

ROBERT STEVENSON/ROBIN MOORE

Santini, Fortunato (b Rome, 5 Jan 1778; d Rome, 14 Sept 1861). Italian bibliophile and composer. He grew up in an orphanage and studied counterpoint with Jannacconi, who continued to teach him when he entered the Collegio Salviati; he left this on 31 July 1798. He studied the organ with Guidi and in 1801 was ordained priest. He had already begun to cultivate an interest in traditional Italian polyphony, both sacred and secular, and in 1796 undertook a massive task of collecting, copying, collating and scoring which lasted for more than 50 years. He thus created a music library of enormous interest and carried on exchanges with the leading musicologists of Europe, freely offering his advice and loans from his collection, as Mendelssohn described in 1830 in his Reisebriefe aus Rom.

In 1820 Santini had already published a catalogue of more than 1000 items in his collection, and manuscript versions of it of varying dates are also in existence. The collection's importance lies in the fact that he managed to make use of the rich holdings of Roman libraries, then generally inaccessible. He made copies of much old music which has otherwise disappeared, and scored music which had been handed down only in performing parts. He also promoted the knowledge of German music in Italy by making versions of works by Bach and Handel and encouraging their performance. (This is also the case with Graun, the text of whose Tod Jesu he translated into Italian.)

On the death of his sister Santini retired into a monastery, relinquishing his library in return for his living and for access to it for the rest of his life. The collection, of about 4500 manuscripts and 1100 printed items, was first housed in the German college in Rome, then in the Diocesan Museum at Münster and finally, after other adventures, in the Episcopal Seminary in Münster. Santini was also a composer of modest gifts, and manuscripts of his music, which was mostly sacred, are to be found in Münster, in the library of the Bologna Conservatory and in the Berlin Singakademie. He was a member of numerous European musical academies.

SERGIO LATTES

Santini, Gabriele (b Perugia, 20 Jan 1886; d Rome, 13 Nov 1964). Italian conductor. After studying at Perugia and at the Bologna Conservatory he began his career at the Teatro Costanzi, Rome. He subsequently conducted at the Teatro Colón, Buenos Aires, for eight seasons and at the Municipal Theatre, Rio de Janeiro. From 1925 to 1929 he assisted Toscanini at La Scala. From Milan he returned to the Rome Opera, where he remained until 1933, and of which he later became artistic director, 1944–7. He conducted at leading Italian theatres and in Paris with the Naples S Carlo company in 1951. Santini kept the lyric tradition alive both by his much-admired performances of the standard repertory and by introducing new works, such as Giordano's Il re (1930, Milan and Rome) and Alfano's Dottor Antonio (1949, Rome). He also conducted the Italian premières of Ravel's L'heure espagnole (1929, Milan) and Milhaud's Christophe Colomb (1954, Rome). His recordings include La traviata (with Callas) and a much-praised Gianni Schicchi (with Gobbi).

CLAUDIO CASINI

Santini, Prospero (fl Rome, 1591–1614). Italian composer. He was maestro di cappella of the Congregazione dei Preti dell'Oratorio. He was principally a composer of laude and canzonette spirituali, eight of which appeared in Roman anthologies (RISM 1591[13], 1592[5], 1599[6], 1600[5]) and three in a German collection (1604[12]). His only known work on a larger scale, the eight-voice motet Angelus Domini descendit for two choirs (1614[3]) is in the Roman polychoral style; it was reprinted and copied into the Pelplin Tablature (in PL-PE; ed. in Musica sacra, xxv, Berlin, 1884/R; facs. in AMP, vi, 1965).

Santiso [Santisso] Bermúdez, Gregorio (b Logares, nr Fonsagrada; d Lugo, 17 March 1738). Spanish theorist and organist. After serving as organist at Sigüenza Cathedral, as maestro de seises at Seville Cathedral and as director of music at the seminary in Seville, he succeeded Domingo Benito as maestro de capilla of Lugo Cathedral on 3 February 1731. From Lugo he wrote a famous letter to the Catalan composer Francesc Valls which Valls reproduced in his Mapa armónico with the date 22 October 1742 (though Santiso had died over four years earlier). Santiso defended Valls in the controversy over the latter's Missa 'Scala aretina', but was himself criticized in Luis Cirilo González's Restáurase la propiedad de B mol, desterrada por Don Gregorio Santisso (Madrid, 1731). Santiso's aesthetic creed was: 'If a composer has a good ear for harmony he is free to embroider'.

JUAN BAUTISTA VARELA DE VEGA

Santley, Sir Charles (b Liverpool, 28 Feb 1834; d London, 22 Sept 1922). English baritone. Son of William Santley, a music teacher, he was a chorister and an amateur singer before he went to Milan in 1855 to study with Gaetano Nava. He made his début at Pavia in 1857 as Dr Grenvil in La traviata, and after appearing in several other small roles returned to England. His first professional English appearance was at St Martin's Hall, London (16 November 1857), singing Adam in Haydn's Creation. In 1858 he studied with the younger Manuel Garcia. Thereafter he sang in many concert and oratorio performances, and on 1 October 1859 made his English stage début, as Hoël in Meyerbeer's Le pardon de Ploërmel, with the Pyne-Harrison company at Covent Garden. He remained with the company until 1863, creating the Rhineberg in Wallace's Lurline (1860), Clifford in Balfe's The Puritan's Daughter (1861), Don Sallustio in Glover's Ruy Blas (1861), Danny Mann in Benedict's The Lily of Killarney (1862) and Fabio in Balfe's The Armourer of Nantes (1863).

In 1862 Santley sang Count di Luna in Il trovatore with the Royal Italian Opera, Covent Garden, and then joined Mapleson's company at Her Majesty's Theatre, appearing as Count Almaviva in Le nozze di Figaro and Nevers in Les Huguenots. In 1863 he sang Valentin with huge success in the first performance of Faust in England. During the season of 1864–5 he sang in operas by Verdi, Donizetti and Meyerbeer at the Liceu, Barcelona, and in 1866 he appeared at La Scala. In London he remained with Mapleson's company until 1870, singing the Dutchman (in Italian) in the first production of a Wagner opera in England. After a season with an English company at the Gaiety Theatre, London, and a year in concert, in 1872 he toured the USA. Having sung there under Carl Rosa, he joined the newly formed Carl Rosa company in 1875, singing Mozart's Figaro on the opening night of the company's first London season. After 1877 he was heard only in concert and oratorio, including Gounod's Rédemption (1882, Birmingham) and Mendelssohn's Elijah (1885, Birmingham). At the Royal Albert Hall on 1 May 1907 he celebrated his jubilee as a singer and later that year was knighted. On 23 May 1911 he made his farewell appearance at Covent Garden, but he emerged from retirement in 1915 to sing at the Mansion House, London, in a concert in aid of Belgian refugees. Although his voice was not naturally beautiful, he sang with great expression and was a particularly dramatic actor.

Santley wrote a number of religious works for the Roman Catholic Church, and was made Commander of St Gregory by Pope Leo XIII in 1887; he also composed several songs under the pseudonym of Ralph Betterton.

MANUEL CARLOS DE BRITO

Santoliquido, Francesco (b S Giorgio a Cremano, Naples, 6 Aug 1883; d Anacapri, 26 Aug 1971). Italian composer. After gaining a diploma at the Liceo di S Cecilia, Rome (1908) he lived mostly as a freelance composer. He spent the years 1912–21 in Tunisia, mainly in the village of Hammamet; and, though he then moved to Rome, he continued to spend much time in Tunis, where he founded a concert society and in 1927 a music school that later became a conservatory. In 1933 he settled in Anacapri.

Santoliquido's early works, such as L'ultima visione di Cassandra and Crepuscolo sul mare, reveal a sensitive but basically unoriginal talent, influenced by both Wagner and Debussy. His residence in Tunisia led him to give several pieces a local colouring; but such features as the augmented 2nds of Il profumo delle oasi sahariane, Ferhuda and comparable works are never more than picturesque. Nor did his idiom change substantially as time went on, though his best inter-war compositions, such as Una lauda medievale (in which Wagner's influence for the time being disappears and Debussy's is modified by wayward progressions of mild dissonances recalling Satie and faintly foreshadowing Messiaen), show that he could sometimes write with real dramatic force. In the triumphal sections of Alba di gloria sul passo Uarièu, however, he lapsed into a naive fanfaring bombast all too relatable to his notorious contributions to the fascist press, where he claimed that, among other things, 'modern music' was to be shunned as an invention of the Jews.

KURT VON FISCHER

Santorini, Lorenz (fl 1699–1764). Italian tenor active in Germany. He is said to have come from Venice (Marpurg) and was a tenor in the service of Elector Johann Wilhelm in Düsseldorf from 1699 to 1716. With the accession of Elector Carl Philipp, Santorini accompanied the electoral Hofkapelle in 1718 to Heidelberg and in 1720 to Mannheim. During Carl Philipp's reign (until 1742) he was appointed secretary, poet and composer to the court with a large salary, enabling him to buy a house in Mannheim in 1735. He was listed in the court records until 1764, although he had retired by 1756.

At the performance of Carlo Grua's festival opera Meride for the inauguration of the Mannheim opera house (1742) Santorini appeared as Cambise. His only known compositions are the mythological serenata Il concilio de' pianeti and a componimento per musica In occasione di solennizzare il fine delle caccie autunnali (librettos at D-MHrm), which were performed at Heidelberg court festivals in 1721; both are works of homage to his patron in the Baroque manner. He wrote the texts for Grua's oratorios La conversione di Sant Ignazio (1740) and Jaele (1741).

ROLAND WÜRTZ/PAUL CORNEILSON

Santoro, Cláudio (b Manaus, Amazonas, 23 Nov 1919; d Brasília, 27 March 1989). Brazilian composer, conductor and violinist. He studied the violin and theory at the Conservatório de Música do Distrito Federal, Rio de Janeiro, graduating in 1936. After making some first attempts at composition in 1938, he became a pupil of Koellreutter, who introduced 12-note techniques to him. He co-founded and played the violin in the Brazil SO (1941–7), and in 1946 he was awarded a Guggenheim Fellowship, but, unable to secure a visa for the USA, he travelled instead to Paris under a French government fellowship. There he studied with Boulanger and was a conducting pupil of Bigot at the Conservatoire. In 1948 he was the Brazilian delegate to the Prague Congress of Progressive Composers, and the meeting's condemnation of dodecaphony as 'bourgeois decadence' influenced his development. Back in Brazil he worked as music director of the Radio Club do Brasil in Rio (1951–3), professor of composition at the Santos School of Music (1953–4), chief conductor of the Brazil SO and artistic director of Radio Ministério da Educação e Cultura (1956). He also taught composition at the Pro Arte seminars in Rio and Teresópolis. In 1962 he was appointed professor and coordinator of music at the University of Brasília, and director of the music section of the Federal Cultural Foundation. The 1964 military takeover, however, created an untenable situation for many faculty members, and Santoro decided to accept a fellowship from the West German government and the Ford Foundation. He moved to Berlin in 1966, and the following year he was invited by the West German government to assist in the organization of the Information and Diffusion Centre for Latin American Music within the Institut für vergleichende Musikstudien und Dokumentation. After a period as music director of the Teatro Novo, Rio (1968–9), he returned to Germany as professor of composition and conducting at the Heidelberg-Mannheim Hochschule für Musik (1970–78). He consolidated his reputation in Europe during this period of creative activity; on his return to the University of Brasília in 1978 he developed intense activity in the capital city, including his foundation and direction of the symphony orchestra of the Teatro Nacional, which was renamed after him upon his death. A member of the Academia Brasileira de Música and of the Brazilian Academy of Arts, he received numerous prizes and commissions.

Santoro's early music, that written between early 1939 and about 1947, was orientated towards atonality, evolving under Koellreutter's influence into a pragmatic 12-note technique and from this to a freer, more flexible serial style. One exception to the abstract work of this period is the semi-programmatic Impressões de uma fundição de aço for orchestra (1942). Some pieces of the years 1945–7 anticipate a second phase in Santoro's music: the Symphony no.2, the Música para cordas, the 6 peças for piano and the Trumpet Sonata are all more subjective and lyrical, more spontaneously nationalist. Santoro began serious studies of Brazilian folk and popular music in 1949–50, and he embraced a nationalist style during the period 1948–60 approximately. His socialist views at this time had an effect on his music – there was some affinity with Prokofiev's Soviet phase and with the symphonic writing of Shostakovich. Canto de amor e paz for string orchestra (1950) received the International Peace Prize of the World Peace Council in Vienna (1952), the Symphony no.4 (1953) was recorded by the USSR State SO and praised by Soviet critics and composers. Although this latter work calls for Brazilian percussion instruments, it has no other nationalist character, but rather resembles Prokofiev in its rhythmic drive. At the same time Santoro was writing overtly nationalist pieces, such as the Third Quartet and Ponteio, and this tendency prevailed in the Symphony no.5. In the next two symphonies he tried to transcend his previously direct folk and popular style, developing a somewhat subjective nationalism in the late 1950s.

In the mid-1960s Santoro returned to a qualified serialism and went on to use aleatory and other new techniques. The Symphony no.8 (1963) was a major turning point in the return, and a clear indication of his concern to free his materials from the restrictions of folk rhythmic and other formulae. Characteristic of what Santoro termed a 'universal form and language' are the Quartets nos.6 and 7 and Interações assintóticas, which shows 'a detachment from conventional orchestral writing, compounded by micro-tuning mixed with impassive static blocks of tone and random "noise" of scraping instruments' (London). His use of aleatory methods and graphic notation began in 1966. Intermitências II, for example, includes random percussive elements and limited improvisation, as well as new performing techniques in the solo piano part; and the Cantata elegíaca, commissioned by the Gulbenkian Foundation, has improvised choral and instrumental passages.

In the late 1960s and 70s Santoro further developed, in an unorthodox manner, his earlier interest in electro-acoustic music, as displayed in his electronic ballet Strukturen (1976) and the Mutationem series for solo instruments and tape. He wrote some of his most solidly crafted works in his later years, such as the well-received cantata Aus den Sonnetten an Orpheus (1979), the Requiem para JK (1986) and his Symphony no.14 (1989). Among the many works written between 1940 and 1963 that he later withdrew are over 13 orchestral works, including four ballets, and numerous chamber, vocal and piano pieces. However, the impressive quality of his output puts him, with Villa-Lobos and Guarnieri, among the foremost Brazilian composers of the 20th century.

GERARD BÉHAGUE

Santórsola, Guido (b Canosa, 18 Nov 1904; d Montevideo, 25 Sept 1994). Uruguayan composer, string player and conductor of Italian birth. His music studies began in São Paulo, where he had theory lessons from his father before entering the conservatory to study with Autuori (violin) and Cantú (harmony and counterpoint). After further training with Baldi, he went to Europe on a Brazilian Government scholarship to pursue violin studies with Fusella in Naples and with Mitowsky at Trinity College, London. On his return to Brazil in 1925 he joined the Paulista Quartet as violist. He founded the Brazilian Musical Institute, where he directed a chamber music course, and was first viola in the orchestra of the Rio de Janeiro Teatro Municipal, also appearing as a soloist on the viola and the viola d'amore. Thereafter he served as professor of violin, viola and harmony at the São Paulo Conservatory before settling in Montevideo as a violist in the radio symphony orchestra (OSSODRE). In 1943 he led an official mission from the institute of musicology on a tour of Brazilian cities, and in 1948 he reorganized the orchestra of Belo Horizonte, where he conducted a series of concerts. He also founded and conducted the orchestra of the Uruguayan Cultural Association and formed the Kleiber Quartet of Montevideo. In addition he has taught at the Montevideo Conservatory as professor of harmony, aesthetics and composition. In 1977 he was invited to the First International Conference on Classical Guitar at Marymount University, Virginia, where he taught composition masterclasses. He participated in subsequent conferences in the Americas and Europe and was a juror to the 1984 International Guitar Festival and Competition, Toronto, where the Kitchener-Waterloo Symphony gave the first perfomance of his Third Guitar Concerto.

Some of his early compositions for piano, guitar, and violin were influenced by Brazilian folk music and incorporated the choro. Later on he was attracted by Uruguayan folk music. The Concertino for Guitar, winner of the 1943 Uruguayan radio composition competition, has a second movement written in a vidalita form. In his mature works he experimented with 12-note music and explored diverse contemporary techniques. He wrote several didactic books about composition, guitar, harmony and fugue.

SUSANA SALGADO

Santos, Carles (b Vinaroz, 1 July 1940). Spanish composer, pianist, conductor and stage director. He began studying music in 1945, training as a pianist and composer at the Barcelona Conservatory. He finished his musical studies at the age of 14 and in 1961 he began his career as a pianist, specializing in contemporary music and giving concerts in several countries. In 1967 he composed his first score for the cinema, L'apat, and in the following year he went to the USA on a March Foundation grant to study composition with John Cage, La Monte Young, Philip Corner and other figures of the American avant garde. In 1975 he made a recording of works by Cage, Webern, Stockhausen and other composers.

He was director of the Grup Instrumental Català (1976–9), whose venue was the Joan Miró Foundation, and from 1978 he has dedicated himself exclusively to the composition and performance of his own works. Following the premières of his musicals Beethoven, si tanco la tapa qué passa? (1983), Santos-Gelabert (1985) and La boqueta amplificada (1985), he received a stipend from the Deutsche Akademisku to live in Berlin as a resident composer (1986). Among the many prizes he has won are the National Composition Prize of Catalonia (1990) and the Barcelona Music Prize (1993). In 1993 his musical Promenade Concert was first performed under his own direction at the Joan Miró Foundation.

The piano plays a vital role in his artistic production; it is not only his main instrument for composition and interpretation but also an integral part of his shows and cinema music. As a pianist he has toured to Paris, New York and other places. He is thus one of the Spanish composers whose music has been most widely disseminated outside Spain, and he has participated several times in the Paris Festival d'Automne and other festivals in Europe and the Americas. In New York he has issued a recording of his works for voice (Voice-Tracks, 1981) and one of his works for piano (Piano-Track, 1984).

MARTA CURESES

Santos, (José Manuel) Joly Braga (b Lisbon, 14 May 1924; d Lisbon, 18 July 1988). Portuguese composer and conductor. He studied the violin and composition at the Lisbon Conservatory (1934–43) but abandoned his studies before graduating. He continued to study composition privately with Luís de Freitas Branco until 1945. In 1947 he joined the music studies department of Portuguese radio, for which he wrote a great deal of music. In addition, after the première of his First Symphony, he studied conducting in Venice with Hermann Scherchen in 1948 on a scholarship from the Portuguese government and, later, composition in Rome with Mortari (1959–60). He was conductor of the Oporto SO, 1955–9, assistant conductor of the Portuguese RSO, 1961–88, and lecturer in analysis and composition at the Lisbon Conservatory from 1972 until his death. He was also music critic for a Lisbon daily newspaper and wrote articles for several encyclopedias and periodicals.

Santos's work is mainly instrumental and may be divided into three phases. His early compositions are clearly indebted to his studies with Branco. In the 1940s and 50s he was influenced by Portuguese Renaissance polyphony: modality, repetition of rhythmic patterns and a preference for classical forms are discernible as significant features. Some works, such as the Third and Fourth Symphonies and the Variações sobre um tema alentejano, also show the influence of folk music. Towards the end of the 1950s, after wider contacts with the European mainstream, he began to experiment with free chromaticism and atonality. Mérope (1958), his second opera, may be considered the beginning of this new period in which harmony and form are freer and subtler, and orchestral colour becomes an essential component. This stylistic renewal reached its highest point in the Fifth Symphony (1966) and in the opera Trilogia das barcas (1968–70), where he tried to associate the new features with the madrigal forms contemporary with the text. After the Sixth Symphony (1971–2) and the Piano Concerto (1973) he preferred freer forms for his orchestral music and sought to escape from clichés and routine, as in his Cello Concerto (1987). In this last period he also composed chamber and vocal music, to which he brought his acute sense of instrumental colour.

Santos, Manuel dos (b Lisbon, *c*1666; d Lisbon, 19 Sept 1737). Portuguese composer and organist. He was the most able pupil of António Marques Lésbio, master of the royal chamber music and of the royal chapel school, and in 1686 he joined the order of S Paulo. Between 1708 and 1716 he received an annual pension of 60,000 réis for the villancicos and Latin sacred works he wrote for the royal chapel. His works, once in the royal chapel, the convent at Serra de Ossa, Coimbra Cathedral and the library of the Duke of Lafões, included Passions, lessons, responsories, an Office of the Dead, villancicos, and a Te Deum for three choirs sung for the reception of the new Queen Marianna of Austria, daughter of Emperor Leopold I, who married King João V in 1708. The only ones to survive are two villancicos (P-EVp; one ed. in PM, xxix, 1976).

Santos, Turibio (Soares) (b São Luís, 7 March 1943). Brazilian guitarist and musicologist. His early guitar studies were with Antonio Rebelo, and he also studied with the composer Edino Krieger. At the age of 20 he gave the première of the Twelve Etudes for guitar by Villa-Lobos, which became standards of the concert repertory, and he has since become an authority on the music of Villa-Lobos in relation to the guitar, and on Brazilian musical culture in general. He also gave the première of Jolivet's Comme un prélude (1970, Paris). Between 1968 and 1986 he made a series of 18 recordings centred around Brazilian and Latin American musical styles. Since the mid-1980s Santos has led a guitar orchestra, the Orchestra de Violões do Rio de Janeiro, with whom he has given concerts and made several recordings. In 1987 he released a recording of the complete guitar works of Villa-Lobos. Santos has published a series of transcriptions for guitar of well-known works by Bach, Beethoven, Sanz, Albéniz and others, entitled Collection Turibio Santos, and more recently the series Arquivos musicais (published in Saõ Paulo). He has also composed six preludes for guitar (1984–6). He was director of the Sala Cecilia Meireles in Rio de Janeiro (1980–81) and since 1985 has been director of the Museu Villa-Lobos. He was created a Chevalier of the Légion d'Honneur in 1985 and a member of the Brazilian Ordem do Cruzeiro do Sol in 1989.

Santucci, Marco (b Camaiore, Tuscany, 4 July 1762; d Lucca, 29 Nov 1843). Italian composer. After appearing at the age of 13 as the prima donna in Sacchini's La contadina in corte and having done some composition, he studied at the Conservatorio di S Maria di Loreto in Naples from 1779. In 1790 he returned to Camaiore, where he was ordained in 1794; in 1797 he succeeded Anfossi as maestro di cappella at S Giovanni in Laterano, Rome, where he remained until 1798, when he moved back to Camaiore. He contributed to a cantata Marco Curzio (1791) for the Luccan dramatic festival known as the Tasche, and in 1806 he won the Accademia Napoleone prize for a 16-part motet for four choirs: the novelty of this was much praised by the judges, but was then sharply contested by Baini. He became a canon of Lucca Cathedral in 1808, and was also one of the eight members of the music section of the Società Italiana founded by Napoleon. In 1830 he fell ill with apoplexy. His many pupils included, briefly and at an early age, Michele Puccini, father of Giacomo. Among his compositions are much church music and some secular choral and instrumental works. In his youth he also wrote a few operas, which he later burnt as 'unworthy of a priest'. His short treatise Sulla melodia, sull'armonia e sul metro (Lucca, 1828) shows a distaste for the Romantic movement in the European countries, particularly German music, and maintains the supremacy of melody over harmony.

JOHN WARRACK/FRANCESCO IZZO

Santur [sadouri, sanṭūr, sant'ur, santuri, sintir, tsintsila]. Dulcimer of the Middle East, south-eastern Europe and South and East Asia. It is used in Iran, Iraq, India, Kashmir, Turkey, Greece, Armenia, China and other areas where Tibetans live.

The prototype of the instrument may be seen in a harp, carried horizontally and struck with two sticks, found in iconographical documents of the ancient Babylonian (1600–911 BCE) and neo-Assyrian (911–612 BCE) eras. In the Hebrew Bible (Old Testament), the santir appears among the instruments in the orchestra of Nebuchadnezzar, King of Chaldea (604–562 BCE). Certain Arab sources mention its use during the Sassanian era (226–641 CE). In the 11th century the instrument was known to Spanish Muslims and, in the 14th, Ibn Khaldūn mentioned its use by Arabs in North Africa. In the 16th century the Egyptians made a distinction between the qānūn and the sanṭūr; Villoteau (Description de l'Egypte, Paris, 1809–28) referred to the sanṭūr as marginal in Egypt itself, though the instrument was most definitely used at that time in Iraq.

In Iran the santur consists of a trapeziform case made of walnut wood, approximately 90 cm wide at the broad end, 35 cm wide at the narrow end and 6 cm deep. The sides form an angle of 45° to the wider end. The strings are fixed to hitch-pins along the left-hand side and wound round metal wrest-pins on the right by means of which they are tuned with a tuning-key. Each quadruple set of strings rests on a movable bridge of hardwood (kharak). These bridges are aligned almost parallel with the sides of the case. The right-hand rank corresponds to the bass strings and that on the left to the treble strings. In the centre of the santur the low-pitched strings on the right cross the high-pitched strings on the left.

The left-hand strings can be played on either side of the bridges. In this way three different courses of strings are available: the lowest-sounding on the right, a second series, sounding an octave higher, left of centre, and the highest-sounding series, giving the third octave, on the left. There are nine (or sometimes 11) quadruple strings on either side so that, with 18 groups of strings, 27 different notes can be played. The bass strings are of brass and the trebles of steel. The first series of strings has a range of e′–f″, the second e″–f‴ and the third e‴–f⁗. The tuning can be readily modified by adjusting the position of the bridges.

The santur is played by striking the strings with two light hammers (mezrāb) held in three fingers of each hand. The hammers do not rebound and the tremolo is controlled solely by a rapid alternating movement of the right and left wrists. Tradition calls for a delicate and precise tone-quality which is obtained only with light hammers of hardwood, and some players stick felt to the ends of the hammers to soften the impact; others have obtained the same result by laying a piece of cloth on the strings. During the second half of the 20th century the Iranian santur virtuoso FARĀMARZ PĀYVAR wrote several books on performance techniques.

The contemporary Iraqi sanṭūr consists of a trapeziform soundbox made from two boards of wood joined together by splints of varying height; hardwoods such as walnut, bitter orange, white beech or apricot may be used. It is approximately 80 to 90 cm wide at the broad end, 31 to 41 cm wide at the narrow end and 7 to 12 cm deep, though when an instrument is made to accompany a specific singer, the size of the soundbox may be changed to accommodate the register of the singer's voice.

Sanṭūr player, Iraq

The Iraqi sanṭūr generally has 23 (recently 25) courses of strings (triple, quadruple and rarely quintuple) tuned in unison. There is no damping mechanism, so the sound of the struck melody notes is accompanied by the sympathetic vibrations of the other strings. Strings were traditionally metallic and varied in thickness, treble ones being of steel and those for the lower octaves of bronze. Bronze has now been replaced by nylon, either used by itself or alternating with brass or steel wire. Each group of strings rests on a movable hardwood bridge with a circular base in the shape of a bobbin. The bridges are placed so that the strings are divided into three sections, giving the fundamental note and two higher octaves. The sanṭūr is played with two light sticks held in three fingers of each hand (see illustration); the ends of the sticks are usually covered with cloth to soften their impact on the strings.

Unlike its modern counterpart, the ancient Persian santūr has fixed bridges, which make it impossible to tune the notes during performance; only a number of basic modes may be played and transposed by three or more degrees on any one instrument. The ancient santūr is still played in Iraq. The santūr has a range of more than three octaves from g to a‴.

In South Asia, the santūr was restricted until recently to Kashmir, with its strong Persian culture. The construction of the Kashmiri santūr is similar to that of its Iranian counterpart (though smaller, deeper, and held on the player's lap), but the tuning differs. Its 100 strings are tuned to nine scalar degrees to the octave (whole tones plus a flat 3rd and 7th) and the range is over one-and-a-half octaves. 12 degrees have two quadruple courses (one of steel, struck with the sticks, and one of brass, resonating sympathetically); the 13th has only a steel course.

In Iran the santur is an important instrument in the traditional orchestra, with the same repertory as the tār and setār (lutes). It is also used in motrebi (music for entertainment), but never in folk music. In Iraq the santūr is part of the classical*shālghī al baghdādī* ('Baghdad ensemble') along with the jūza (four-string spike fiddle), the daff zinjārī (frame drum with cymbalets), the ṭabl (single-headed drum) and the naqqāra (double kettledrum). The principal role of the shālghī is to accompany classical singing (maqām 'irāqī) in teahouses, private homes and concerts. In the Caucasus, the sant'ur or santuri (which may have from 13 to 26 courses from triple to quintuple) is used mainly in the sazandar and ashugh (folk poet-singers) ensembles. In Greece its equivalent, the sadouri, is used in small folk ensembles.

The Kashmiri santūr is the leading instrument of the religious art-music ensemble sūfyāna kalām ('Sufic utterance'). Together with the setār (long lute), dukrā (drums) and (formerly) the sāz-ī-kāshmīr (spike fiddle), it accompanies kalām songs in a repertory of over 50 modes, some with Indian rāga names, some Middle Eastern. It was introduced into Hindustani rāga music by SHIV KUMAR SHARMA, who has become the instrument's most famous exponent. Fixed-pitch chordophones were not formerly prominent in Indian court music because of the stylistic importance of voice-derived portamento (mīṛ), but Sharma introduced a virtuoso stick-technique which re-creates the sound of vocal portamento through timing and tremolo. Since then the instrument has enjoyed growing popularity. It does not have a fixed tuning system but is re-tuned from piece to piece to a scale in the rāga system, in three octave registers.

JOHN WHENHAM

Sanxian. Long-necked plucked lute of the Han Chinese. The name appears as either sanxian ('three string') or popularly as xianzi ('string', zi being a diminutive suffix). The sanxian is constructed of a long fretless neck of redwood or other hardwood, its lower end passing through a small oval (or square) soundchamber (see illustration). Distinguishing features include three elongated tuning pegs inserted laterally into a spatula-shaped peg box, strings of silk (more recently of nylon or steel), and covering of the soundchamber on both sides with python skin. The three strings, which hold a short bridge against the snakeskin head, are usually tuned to intervals of a 4th (between the low and middle strings) and 5th (between the middle and high strings), or vice versa. Other tunings are occasionally found as well. In performance, the soundchamber rests on the player's right thigh, the neck extending out to the left at an upward angle. Strings are plucked using fingernails or a small plectrum.

Several sizes of sanxian are common. In north China, the 'large sanxian' of about 120 cm in length is the principal instrument employed to accompany genres of dagushu narrative song. In the Jiangnan area (central-eastern China), a 'small sanxian' of about 95 cm is used in the ensemble tradition of sizhu ('silk-and-bamboo'), Kunqu opera, tanci narrative song and other genres. The Chaozhou people in coastal areas of south China have a still shorter sanxian of about 80 cm, used in xianshi ('string-poem') ensemble music and the local opera tradition. Many other varieties of related lutes are found among minority peoples, especially in south-west China, such as the very large long-necked lute of the Yi (about 150 cm) and the small lute of the Lahu (between about 50 and 70 cm).

While the sanxian is popularly believed to have emerged in China during Mongol rule (*c*14th century), recent research has shown that the name was known during the Tang dynasty (618–907), and a similar lute was depicted in tomb art of the 12th century. While its precise lines of development are not clear, it does seem certain that the instrument was introduced into China from elsewhere. In fact it shares important structural features (such as neck-type, resonator-type and number of strings) with the SETAR and tanbur of Central Asia. An important instrument for song accompaniment during the Yuan and Ming periods (*c*14th to early 17th centuries), the sanxian was subsequently introduced into Japan (SHAMISEN) and the Ryūkyū Islands. Its popularity in China has continued to the present day, both as an instrument for accompaniment of narrative song and as a low-pitched instrument used in traditional ensembles.

ALAN R. THRASHER

Sanxian (three-string lute) (Gemeentemuseum, The Hague)

Sanz, Gaspar (b Calanda, Aragon, mid-17th century; d early 18th century). Spanish guitarist, composer and priest. Early in his life he received a Bachelor of Theology degree from the University of Salamanca and later travelled to Italy, where he studied music under Cristoforo Caresana and Lelio Colista, and possibly also under Orazio Benevoli and Pietro Andrea Ziani. On returning to Spain he published not only his Instrucción de música sobre la guitarra española but also two literary works: a Spanish translation of Daniello Bartoli's L'uomo de lettere (Madrid, 1678) and a eulogy in praise of Pope Innocent XI entitled Ecos sagrados (Madrid, 1681).

Sanz's Instrucción de música is the most comprehensive guitar treatise of its time. Comprising three books, it contains 90 pieces written for a five-course instrument tuned a/a–d′/d′–g/g–b/b–e′, the majority of which are based on dance forms, such as the folía, canario and españoleta, typical of the late 17th-century Spanish Baroque style. The first book includes a detailed introductory tutor with instructions for stringing, fretting and tuning and an explanation of both the rasgueado (strummed) and punteado (plucked) styles; it also contains a long essay on figured bass accompaniment for the guitar. While many of its pieces are intended for beginners, those in the second and third books are longer, broader in scope and more technically demanding.

Sanz's work was very popular in Spain and initiated a series of similar works, such as those of Ruiz de Ribayaz, Guerau and Santiago de Murcia. Various pieces from it and parts of the text appear in six publications and manuscripts, French as well as Spanish, up to 1763.

Galindo Dimas. She taught at the Academia de Danza Mexicana, the Escuela de Arte Dramático of the Instituto Nacional de Bellas Artes and the Centro Universitario de Teatro and coordinated the Ballet Folklórico de México. Her output includes stories and songs for children, chamber music, orchestral works, music for numerous short documentaries and theatrical productions and for the film La Sunamita, the ballet El forastero and for the Griselda Alvarez success, Letania erótica para la paz. Her Cantata de la Independencia de Centroamérica won her first prize in the competition on the 150th anniversary, in 1971, of Costa Rican independence; it had its première in 1984. In 1976 she received first prize in the choral music competition of the Teatro Nacional of Costa Rica for her Sucedió en Belén, five villancicos to texts by Sister Juana de la Cruz. In her later years she devoted herself almost exclusively to the important and highly successful radio programme El rincón de niños ('Children's Corner'), broadcast from 1972 by Radio UNAN; a prize named after her, for children's music and songs, was created by the Grupo Signo de México in 1981. Notable among her works are Hilos, a suite for string orchestra, and Canciones de la muerte for soprano, given at the 1993 congress of women composers in Mexico.

JORGE LUIS ACEVEDO VARGAS

Sanzogno, Nino (b Venice, 13 April 1911; d Milan, 4 May 1983). Italian conductor and composer. He studied the violin with de Guarneri and composition with Agostini at the Venice Liceo Musicale, and took postgraduate studies with Malipiero in Venice and with Scherchen in Brussels, where he won the 1937 Henry de Beuf International Competition and began a career distinguished by his work for contemporary music. He directed the Gruppo Strumentale Italiano in concerts at home and abroad, and became resident conductor at the Teatro La Fenice, Venice, in 1937, and of the Milan RAI SO soon afterwards. He first conducted at La Scala in 1939; in 1955 he inaugurated the Piccola Scala with Il matrimonio segreto. He appeared with this company at the 1957 Edinburgh Festival with Cimarosa's opera and L'elisir d'amore, as well as in other countries. During these years he was responsible for many premières, including Poulenc's Dialogues des carmélites at La Scala (1957), Milhaud's David and Malipiero's L'allegra brigata; he also conducted the first Italian productions of Walton's Troilus and Cressida at La Scala in 1956, and of Lulu, A Midsummer Night's Dream, The Fiery Angel and Shostakovich's Lady Macbeth of the Mtsensk District, mainly at successive Venice Festivals. He toured widely as a guest conductor, including concerts with the BBC SO with which he introduced to Britain Dallapiccola's Job and works by Malipiero, Petrassi and others; he also conducted a double bill of Dallapiccola and Malipiero operas from the Maggio Musicale Fiorentino at the 1969 Edinburgh Festival. At the Piccola Scala and elsewhere his extensive repertory was widened by a developing interest in Classical and early music, and he was resident conductor at La Scala, 1962–5. British audiences were impressed by his quiet, subtle control, his precision and his firm discipline masked by outward elegance and charm. He taught conducting at Darmstadt, and his compositions include two symphonic poems, I quattro cavalieri dell'Apocalisse (1930) and Vanitas (1931), concertos for viola (1935) and cello (1937) and works for chamber ensembles.

LEONARDO PINZAUTI

São João, Gabriel de (d 23 Dec 1651). Portuguese composer and organist. In 1624 he was sent from the Augustinian priory of S Cruz in Coimbra to the monastery of S Vicente de Fora in Lisbon, where his services as a keyboard player were required. An obituary described him as a 'most skilled master in the whole art of music'.

Dom Gabriel's music survives in what may be (at least partly) autograph manuscripts, judging by the amount of recomposition. His vocal works employ a simple harmonic language enlivened by a liberal, if crude, use of passing notes and false relations. Homophonic textures are commonest, and even where imitation appears (most often in the Missa 'Al rigor') it is usually brief and formulaic. Both Latin works are polychoral, and such writing is frequent also in the vilhancicos. The most elaborate of the latter is Hola hau pastorcillos (for Christmas 1645), an unusually extended work with solos, choruses and ritornellos for wind instruments. Hola hau, Andar, andar, the Missa 'Al rigor' and the romance Comamos alma juntos show the composer's fondness for echo effects and for sections in triple metre involving syncopation. The two surviving pieces for instrumental consort reveal a concern with canon; the Concertado is an exercise in largely canonic counterpoint around a monorhythmic cantus firmus, while the Fuga is a simple four-in-one canon at the unison.

OWEN REES

São Paulo. City in Brazil. It was founded in 1554. The first documented musical references date from 1611 when the cathedral was established; from its foundation it maintained a mestre de capela, whose duties included musical composition and teaching; Manoel Pais Linhares, Vieira de Barros and Lopes de Siqueira were mestres in the 17th century and Manoel Lopes de Siqueira and Angelo de Siqueira in the 18th. They and their pupils contributed to the development of religious brotherhoods initiated by the Portuguese metropolis. When São Paulo was raised to a diocese in 1745 the mestre de capela was Matias Alvares Torres; he was replaced in 1774 by André da Silva Gomes, who occupied the post for 50 years, concurrently teaching Latin in the city. Some 200 of his sacred compositions in the cathedral archives are the oldest known musical documents of São Paulo. In the 19th and 20th centuries the cathedral continued to be a centre for the cultivation of sacred music, from Antonio José de Almeida, who succeeded da Silva Gomes, to Furio Franceschini, appointed in 1908.

Within the state of São Paulo several communities developed intense musical activity, evident from the many works of 18th-century mestres de capela, of whom the most important included Faustino Prado Xavier (1709–1801) in Mogi das Cruzes, André da Silva Moura (1725–1809) in Santos, Manoel Gonçalves Franco (1740–1814) in Guará, José Ribeiro de Siqueira (1700–72) in Parnaíba, Manoel Julião da Silva Ramos (1763–1824) in Atibaia, Jesuino do Monte Carmelo (1764–1819) in Itú, Pedro de Alcântara (1722–96) and his son Antonio do Rosário (b 1759) in Sorocaba.

In the 18th century in South America 'opera' was a generic term for theatrical performance. By 1750 São Paulo had a Casa da Ópera, under the direction in 1774 of the Bahian musician Antonio Manso da Mota; the Teatro da Ópera in the Pátio do Colégio was also established in the 18th century. Travellers reported local performances of opera excerpts, particularly on the occasion of the acclamation of the first Emperor of Brazil in 1822. Augusta Candiani was the first important European opera singer to perform in São Paulo (1847), and she was followed a few years later by many European artists presenting the standard Italian operatic repertory; in 1860 the Companhia Buffa Francesa presented the music of Offenbach and Delibes. In the following year the Teatro da Ópera produced Fortunato G.P. Andrade's comic opera Palavra de Rei, strongly influenced by Donizetti, and at about that time Brazilian opera emerged, with the first presentations in Rio de Janeiro of works by Elías Álvares Lôbo and Carlos Gomes, both born in São Paulo. The Teatro S José in the Largo S Gonçalo was inaugurated in 1864, preceding by ten years the city's first well-organized lyric company, that of José Ferri. With the inauguration of the Teatro Santana and the Teatro Municipal (1911) regular annual music drama seasons began.

Concert life started in the 1850s, when visiting soloists appeared with the first local orchestras. After 1880 a substantial Italian colony grew up in São Paulo; in that year Luigi Chiaffarelli (1850–1923), founder of the city's piano school and teacher of Guiomar Novais, Antonieta Rudge and others, settled there. He initiated regular concert life in his famous musical soirées (continued later by Agostino Cantù); at one of these in 1899 he presented Henrique Oswald's Quartet in G, in the presence of Saint-Saëns. In 1883 the Haydn Club was founded under the direction of the composer Alexandre Levy (1864–92), organizing chamber music and symphonic concerts until 1887; it was succeeded by the Mendelssohn Club, mostly dedicated to choral music. The Sociedade de Cultura Artística (1912) and the Sociedade de Concertos Sinfônicos de São Paulo (1921) reflected the development of concert life in the city. The short-lived Sociedade Sinfônica de São Paulo (1930–31) had Heitor Villa-Lobos and Lamberto Baldi as its conductors.

The Sociedade Bach, under Martin Braunwieser, the Seminários de Música da Pro-Arte, under Hans J. Koellreutter, and the Orquestra Sinfônica de Amadores were founded in the 1940s. The sphere of professional activity widened with the creation of the Orquestra Sinfônica da Rádio Gazeta, the Orquestra de Câmara do Angelicum do Brasil (1951) under Mario Rossini, the Orquestra Sinfônica Estadual de São Paulo (1952) and the Associação Paulista de Música (1956) with its chamber orchestra under the direction of Olivier Toni, its string quartet and Coral Piratininga under Eunice Catunda. The movement of Juventude Musical Brasileira (Brazilian Musical Youth) was also initiated in the 1950s. The Manifesto de Música Nova (1963) brought together avant-garde musicians, including Damiano Cozzella, Rogério Duprat, Régis Duprat, Gilberto Mendes and Willy Corrêa de Oliveira, who advocated and presented concerts of new music. The state educational television (Anchieta Foundation) emerged concurrently with the Movimento Villa-Lobos, which sponsored the creation of mixed choral groups throughout the state, such as the distinguished Coral da Universidade de São Paulo under Benito Juarez.

One of the most far-reaching accomplishments in the city's music history was Mário de Andrade's organization of the Departamento Municipal de Cultura during the 1930s. He initiated regular symphony concerts, which became possible with the founding of the Orquestra Sinfônica Municipal, and founded the Coral Paulistano, the Quarteto Municipal and the Discoteca Municipal. Under his supervision composition contests were instituted and monographs published.

The Conservatório Dramático e Musical de São Paulo (1906), which developed from piano teaching in the city, soon became a centre of musical studies and composition; its teachers included Chiaffarelli, Cantù, João Gomes Araujo, Alfério Mignone, Samuel Arcanjo, Francisco Casabona and Savino de Beneditis, and later Mário de Andrade. Among its students were Francisco Mignone, Artur Pereira, Camargo Guarnieri and Frutuoso Viana. The Academia Paulista de Música was founded in the 1960s. In 1928 João Gomes jr, Francisco Casabona, Félix Otero and João Julião organized the Instituto Musical de São Paulo, which underwent considerable reforms in 1971 under the direction of Neide Rodrigues Gomes. In 1970 the department of music of São Paulo University was established at the Escola de Communicações e Artes with a staff of 17 under the direction of Olivier Toni. It offers undergraduate and postgraduate courses in composition, conducting, instrumentation and musicology, and publishes Revista Musica (from 1990).

The existence of the conservatory prompted the establishment of the Edições Ricordi, which published Italian didactic works and Brazilian works. Publishing ventures expanded with the founding of the Editora Casa Vitali. Musical periodicals published in São Paulo have included the Gazeta musical (1893–5), the review Música (1896), the Gazeta artística (1909–14), Ariel (1923–5) and Resenha musical (1938–45). From the early 20th century daily newspapers such as the Estado de São Paulo, the Diário de São Paulo and the Diário popular had regular music columns. A regional council of the Ordem dos Músicos do Brasil (National Musicians' Union) was established in 1960.

RÉGIS DUPRAT

Saorgin, René (b Cannes, 31 Oct 1928). French organist and authority on organs. He studied with Duruflé and Gallon at the Paris Conservatoire, where he received the premier prix in counterpoint. In 1958 he won the Bach Prize at the organ competition in Ghent. He is organ professor at the Nice Conservatory, where he is also organist of St Jean-Baptiste, and is an advisory member for historic organs on the Paris Commission Supérieure des Monuments Historiques. Saorgin was one of the founders of the organ academy in St Maximin. In 1972 and 1973 he was professor of French organ music at the organ academy in Haarlem. He has written a study of historical Italian organs from the region of Nice and built by Serassi, Lingiardi, Agati, Grinda and Valoncini (Nice, 1980). Saorgin has undertaken recital tours both in his own country and in Italy, Switzerland, Austria, Belgium and the USA. He specializes in Italian and north German music of the 17th and 18th centuries; among his recordings are the complete works of Buxtehude, pieces by Frescobaldi, and a first performance of 'Musique Militaire et Théâtrale' from the 19th century, a recording which won the Grand Prix du Disque. In 1984 Saorgin was appointed organist of Monaco Cathedral.

GERHARD WIENKE

Saperton [Saperstein], David (b Pittsburg, 29 Oct 1889; d Baltimore, 5 July 1970). American pianist. He received his earliest musical tuition from his father and grandfather, and subsequently took lessons from Joseph Gittings and August Spanuth. He later studied theory and composition with Hugo Kaun in Berlin and attended masterclasses with Busoni. He had already performed a Mendelssohn concerto in Pittsburgh when he was ten, and at the age of 15 appeared at the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, with Chopin's E minor concerto. His European début took place in Berlin in 1908, in a joint concert with Geraldine Farrar, and a year later he toured Europe and Russia. In January 1915 he presented a series of six demanding recitals on consecutive days in New York; his programmes included the American première of Szymanowski's Second Sonata and, among other works, several Busoni transcriptions, the complete Liszt Etudes d'exécution transcendante and Grandes études de Paganini as well as the Brahms Paganini Variations. Two years later he embarked on a coast-to-coast tour of the USA lasting nearly eight months.

In 1924 Saperton married Vanita Godowsky, the elder daughter of Leopold Godowsky; and through Godowsky's good offices he became assistant to Josef Hofmann and faculty member of the Curtis Institute (of Music) in Philadelphia. The close contact with his father-in-law led him to make an intensive study of Godowsky's transcriptions and original compositions, which thereafter formed an important part of his recital repertory. Although Godowsky was impressed with certain aspects of Saperton's performances, he felt that at times he sensationalized the music. This is partly borne out in recordings Saperton made in the 1950s which, while displaying a formidable command and some intensely poetic colouring, occasionally become too episodic and over-emphatic. In later years, after leaving the Curtis Institute, he endeavoured to resume his performing career, while continuing to teach privately in New York; he also composed a number of virtuoso piano works, among which Zephyr gained some popularity. His students included Jorge Bolet, Abbey Simon, Jacques Abram and Sidney Foster.

CHARLES HOPKINS

Saponov, Mikhail Aleksandrovich (b Chkalov [now Orenburg], 2 April 1946). Russian musicologist. He studied musicology under Kholopov at the Moscow Conservatory (1968–73) (where his other teachers included Schnittke and Tsïtovich) and obtained the Kandidat degree there in 1978. In 1976 he began teaching the history of Western European music at the Moscow Conservatory, where he became a senior lecturer in 1985, head of the department for non-Russian music in 1990 and professor in 1992; in 1992 he also took the doctorate and he taught at the Academy of Music in Lovran, Croatia (until 1994).

Saponov's interests are broad, and include medieval, Renaissance, Baroque and 20th-century avant-garde music, and the musical culture of Latin America. Influenced by Tolstoy and Ferand, Saponov's views on the history of European musical culture emphasize the role of oral traditions in professional music-making. Interpreting Western musical culture up to the 17th century as a 'minstrel culture', he describes the distinctive aesthetic character associated with 'types' of professional musicians whose categories he outlines. He also translated into Russian three texts by Jean Cocteau, including Le coq et l'arlequin (Moscow, 1999).

TAT'YANA KYUREGYAN

Saporiti [Codecasa], Teresa (b 1763; d Milan, 17 March 1869). Italian soprano. As a member of Pasquale Bondini's company she sang, with her sister Antonia (d 1787), in Leipzig, Dresden and Prague. A report in the Litteratur und Theater Zeitung (summer 1782) refers to 'both Demoiselles Saporiti' being engaged to sing for Bondini's company:

> The elder, Antonia, had been a concert singer in Leipzig. She sings the most difficult passages with considerable ease; it is a pity that her voice is somewhat small and that she neglects expression in recitatives. Her younger sister is half a beginner as an actress and singer, and is acclaimed only because of her figure ... the younger Demoiselle Saporiti often appears in man's costume and takes over the role of a castrato, which she does poorly and with a bad grace.

Mozart thought well enough of Saporiti, however, to write elaborate and demanding music for her as Donna Anna in Don Giovanni (1787, Prague). Shortly after she left Prague for Italy, where she joined the opera circuit, appearing mainly in comic, but also serious operas. In 1795 she sang in St Petersburg and the following year in Moscow. She composed two arias, Dormivo in mezzo al prato and Caro mio ben deh senti, which appeared in a collection by J.-B. Hanglaise, Journal d'airs ... avec accompagnement de guittare (1796).

CHRISTOPHER RAEBURN/R

Sapozhnikov, Vladimir Alekseyevich (b Novosibirsk, 20 Jan 1945). Russian composer. He graduated from the Leningrad Conservatory in the class of Sergey Slonimsky (1970) and now teaches composition at the Moscow Central Children's Music School. He employs individual, but sometimes paradoxical methods in his approach to problems posed by the use of traditional genres and forms. Alongside his more conventional opera – Zhena muzha v Parizh provozhala ('A Wife Accompanied her Husband to Paris') – and two ballets, he has written distinctive stage works, called 'mono-shows': Prazdnik durakov ('A Festival of Fools'), where the traditions of 'skomorokhi' art were brought back to life, and Pantomuzïka ('Pantomime Music'), a piano cycle which includes elements of a happening. His symphonic works are imbued with philosophic and pantheistic moods and employ unusual resolutions of problems related to timbre. Choral works form the greater part of Sapozhnikov's output. They are characterized by unusual combination of texts (Vechnïy svet ('Eternal Light'), influenced by ancient Chinese and Indian music, sets the words of African, English and Russian folksongs, the poems of Rimbault, Bryusov, Khlebnikov and V. Solov'yov) and by the inclusion of theatrical elements (the staged cantata Risunok vetra ('A Drawing of the Wind') sets texts drawn from Japanese lyric poetry).

M. GALUSHKO

Sapp, Allen (Dwight) (b Philadelphia, 10 Dec 1922; d Cincinnati, 4 Jan 1999). American composer and arts administrator. He studied at Harvard University, where his composition teachers included Piston and Fine; he later studied with Copland and Boulanger (1942–3). After serving as a cryptanalyst during World War II, he returned to Harvard for postgraduate work, teaching at the University from 1950 to 1958. His music from that period employs serial techniques within modal, neo-classical and broadly lyrical contexts.

After a brief tenure at Wellesley College (1958–61), Sapp was appointed chair of the music department at the University of Buffalo (later SUNY, Buffalo). Together with Lukas Foss, he founded the Center of the Creative and Performing Arts, transforming Buffalo into one of the major centres for experimental music in the 1960s and 70s. He also held administrative positions with the American Council for the Arts in Education (1972–4), Project Arts/Worth (1971–4) and Florida State University (1975–8). After two years as dean of the University of Cincinnati: College Conservatory of Music (1978–80), he returned to teaching composition. Some of his later works break away from classical models, displaying a high degree of experimentalism and an expanded dramatic range.

Sappho (b Lesbos, *c*612 BCE). Greek lyric poet. A younger contemporary of Alcaeus, she devoted much of her mature life to leading and training a group of well-born young girls of Mitylene, a chief city of Lesbos, in the performance of ritual and music dedicated mostly to Aphrodite, the Graces and the MUSES. Men had no part in the life of this group; loyalties and passions were intense. In Plutarch's description (Dialogue on Love, 762–3), Sappho 'speaks words mingled truly with fire, and through her songs, she draws up the heat of her heart'. To express her own powerful moods of love, jealousy and disappointment, Sappho employed the new form of lyric monody and the stanza since called by her name. (See also ALCAEUS.) Of her choral compositions for cult use, only scattered lines remain. More extensive fragments of her epithalamia (wedding songs) survive. Divided choirs of young men and girls, it seems, performed these antiphonally.

Sappho mentioned the pēktis (Campbell, frags.22, 156), usually identified as a harp-like Lydian instrument. She used the term chelus, the specific Greek name for the true lyre (lura), just once (Campbell, frag.118). This is presumably a generic usage; the string instrument regularly associated with her is the BARBITOS. Later claims (e.g. in Athenaeus, xiv.635e; Pseudo-Plutarch, On Music, 1136d, citing the authority of Aristoxenus) that she first brought into use the pēktis (alternatively, the plēktron or plectrum, the similar Greek terms having been confused) and invented the Mixolydian tonos are not compelling.

Saqueboute. A French term used up to the 18th century for TROMBONE.

Sarabande. One of the most popular of Baroque instrumental dances and a standard movement, along with the allemande, courante and gigue, of the suite. It originated during the 16th century as a sung dance in Latin America and Spain. It came to Italy early in the 17th century as part of the repertory of the Spanish five-course guitar. During the first half of the century various instrumental types developed in France and Italy, at first based on harmonic schemes, later on characteristics of rhythm and tempo. A fast and a slow type finally emerged, the former preferred in Italy, England and Spain, the latter in France and Germany.

The French spelling 'sarabande' was also used in Germany and sometimes in England; there, however, 'saraband' was often preferred. The Italian usage is 'sarabanda', the Spanish 'zarabanda'.

1. Early development to *c*1640. 2. The later sarabande: (i) Italy, Spain and England (ii) France and Germany (iii) 19th and 20th centuries.

1. EARLY DEVELOPMENT TO *c*1640. The earliest literary references to the zarabanda come from Latin America, the name first appearing in a poem by Fernando Guzmán Mexía in a manuscript from Panama dated 1539, according to B.J. Gallardo (Ensayo de una biblioteca española de libros raros y curiosos, Madrid, 1888–9, iv, 1528). A zarabanda text by Pedro de Trejo was performed in 1569 in Mexico and Diego Durán mentioned the dance in his Historia de las Indias de Nueva-España (1579). The zarabanda was banned in Spain in 1583 for its extraordinary obscenity, but literary references to it continued throughout the early 17th century in the works of such writers as Cervantes and Lope de Vega. From about 1580 to 1610 it seems to have been the most popular of the wild and energetic Spanish bailes, superseded finally by the chacona (see CHACONNE), with which it is frequently mentioned. The dance was accompanied by the guitar, castanets and possibly other percussion instruments, and by a text with refrain.

Most surviving examples of the early zarabanda occur in Italian tablatures for the Spanish guitar, beginning in 1606 with Girolamo Montesardo's Nuova inventione d'intavolatura. Ex.1 shows a reconstruction of the musical scheme that would usually have been repeated for each line of the text, alternating with and without an anacrusis. The top staff shows the melodic framework, which could be varied, and the lower staff (from one of Montesardo's guitar examples) represents major triads to be strummed, the stems showing the direction in which the hand is to move. The refrain text comes from an example in Luis de Briçeño's Metodo mui facilissimo (Paris, 1626). The I–IV–I–V harmonic progression was a constant feature of the early zarabanda and can be found also in the later guitar books of Benedetto Sanseverino (ex.2), G.A. Colonna (1620), Fabrizio Costanzo (1627), G.P. Foscarini

(1629) and Antonio Carbonchi (1640 and 1643), as well as in the guitar works of Spanish composers as late as

Lucas Ruiz de Ribayaz in 1677. Although the dance seems to have been performed without a text in Italy, the musical scheme of the zarabanda was sometimes indicated for the singing of poetry (in I-Fr 2774, 2793, 2804, 2849 and 2951).

Although ostinato repetition of the single phrase of ex.1 was most usual in Italy, a two-phrase structure occasionally occurred. In Briçeño's two examples entitled La çaravanda española muy façil, the first line of the refrain has a harmonic pattern like that of ex.1, but in the second line the IV chord in the first bar is replaced by V. The same structure appears in pieces by Gaspar Sanz (1674) and Ruiz de Ribayaz (1677), but a different two-phrase plan occurs in the Aria di saravanda in varie partite for lute by Piccinini (1623). Its opening phrase is similar to that shown in ex.1, but without the hemiola rhythm; the second phrase begins on a minor submediant chord and bears little resemblance to ex.1.

In Italy and Spain both the single phrases of ex.1 and longer double-phrase structures beginning like ex.1 were often called zarabanda spagnola in order to distinguish them from different types that were developing elsewhere. In France the sarabande usually had no text. Its musical structure, like that of most French Baroque dances, was freely sectional, with two (or sometimes more) repeated sections of varying length. The sarabande appeared early in the 17th century in the ballet de cour, as seen in Praetorius's Terpsichore (1612). He included examples for each of two types of sarabande, a courrant sarabande, made up of repeated sections, and a non-sectional sarabande, which sometimes begins with the pattern shown in ex.1. Ex.3 shows one of the latter, with its metre, barring and note values altered to facilitate comparison with ex.1.

About 1620 a new type of sarabande called the zarabanda francese appeared in Spanish and Italian guitar books as well as in the Bentivoglio lutebook of 1615 (US-SFsc). The name seems to refer to a non-texted dance with a sectional structure. A zarabanda francese by G.A. Colonna (1637) has a harmonic scheme identical to that of ex.3, but its second section (beginning in the fifth bar) is marked for repetition.

Briçeño's Metodo mui facilissimo includes an untexted çaravanda françesa y buena in addition to texted Spanish examples. Antonio Carbonchi, in 1643, entitled single phrases like ex.1 serabanda spagnuola and sectional pieces serabanda franzese. Unlike the original Spanish type the Italian zarabanda francese could be in either mode. Those in the major tended at first to begin with a phrase like that in ex.1; those in the minor were often based on the chordal scheme later associated with the FOLIA (chords in brackets indicate those that were sometimes added; upper- or lower-case Roman numerals indicate major or minor triads): i–V–i–(VI)–VII–III–(VI–VII–III)–VII–i–V–(i). Three or five of the opening chords (i–V–i or i–V–i–VII–III) could appear in the first phrase, and the entire scheme could occur either once (with the first half ending on III) or twice (cadencing on V and i).

Ex.3 Praetorius: La sarabande (1612), outer voices

After 1650, however, the zarabanda francese seldom displayed any particular harmonic scheme.

During the 1630s rhythm began to become a distinguishing feature of the dance. The sarabandes of François de Chancy, Jacques de Belleville, T. Chevallier and Bouvier contained in Pierre Ballard's Tablature de luth de differens autheurs (Paris, 1631) emphasize the rhythm shown in ex.4*a*. Mersenne (Harmonie universelle, 1636) printed two sarabandes, one by 'Mr. Martin' that uses the rhythm of ex.4*a*, and another that begins like ex.4*b*. The latter rhythm occurs in a sarabande for trumpet and continuo (1638) by Girolamo Fantini (ex.5 shows the opening statement, which is followed by two variations). He notated it in 3/8, presumably to indicate a faster tempo than in his saltarellos or gagliarde, which he wrote in 3/2, or some of his correntes in 3/4 or 6/4. The same rhythm appeared in later Italian guitar sarabandas (incorporating by this time single notes as well as chords), starting with those by Francesco Corbetta in 1639. G.M. Bononcini (Arie, correnti, sarabande, gighe, & allemande, 1671) used the rhythm of ex.4*a* in a piece for violin and continuo called Sarabanda in stil francese (ex.6*a*), and the rhythm of ex.4*b* in a Sarabanda (ex.6*b*). The first was notated in 3/4, the second in 6/4, suggesting that the rhythm of ex.4*a*, preferred in France, implied a slower tempo with three substantial beats per bar, while that of ex.4*b*, more common in Italy, implied a faster tempo and a compound metre with one accent for each triple group.

Thus there seems to have been a preference, particularly strong among French lute and harpsichord composers, for an increasingly slow and deliberate kind of sarabande, in which (as in French versions of the allemande and the courante) the idiomatic and contrapuntal possibilities of those instruments might be most fully exploited.

2. THE LATER SARABANDE.

(i) Italy, Spain and England. Italian sarabandas occurred mainly in solo music for guitar and in continuo chamber music. Most sarabandas for guitar from 1640 to 1692 used the rhythm of ex.4*b*, notably the earlier ones of G.P. Foscarini (*c*1640), Antonio Carbonchi, A.M. Bartolotti (1640), Domenico Pellegrini (1650) and G.B. Granata (1651). Corbetta included some sarabandas that began with the rhythm of ex.4*a*, others that used that of ex.4*b*, in his Varii capricii per la ghittara spagnuola (1643). In La guitarre royalle, dedicated by Corbetta in 1671 to Charles II of England, two sarabandes with dotted second beats were notated in 3/2 rather than the usual 3/4 metre; one of them, Sarabande de tombeau de Madame, has both French and Italian texts. Such titles as Saravanda alla francese (Carbonchi, 1640) and Sarabanda francese per B mole (Granata, 1646) continued to refer in guitar books simply to the sectional sarabanda as distinct from the original dance music as shown in ex.1. The guitar sarabanda was joined with other dances beginning in A.M. Bartolotti's book (1640), in which it is six times preceded by an allemanda and two correntes. Corbetta's Varii capricii has allemanda–corrente–sarabanda groups; G.B. Granata (Nuova scielta di capricci armonici, 1651) and Ludovico Roncalli (1692) preceded this group with a preludio or toccata and sometimes added other dances as well. Ricci, a conservative composer who in 1677 still indicated only strummed chords, wrote that 'in the correnti, sarabande and ciacconne one is to play fast'.

In Italian ensemble music tempos are more explicitly marked. The preferred faster type, often characterized by the rhythm of ex.4*b*, was indicated by the marking 'allegro' or 'presto' in works of P.C.C. Albergati (1682), Domenico Gabrielli (1684), Torelli (1686), Salvatore Mazzella (1689), Giorgio Buoni (1693), and G.B. Brevi (1693). B.G. Laurenti (1691) and T.A. Vitali (1701) marked their sarabandas 'largo', Vivaldi wrote a Sarabanda andante, and Corelli used vivace, adagio and largo tempo markings for sarabandas (see HAM, no.253, for the latter). Dances are usually grouped together in these sources, opening with an allemanda or balletto (preceded sometimes by an introductory movement), followed by a corrente or giga or both, and concluding with a sarabanda. Italian sarabandas usually have two repeated sections of variable length, and show a special concern with the tonal and melodic design of each. Buoni in 1693, for example, sometimes repeated the opening melody at the end of the second section, creating a rounded binary form.

The saraband was mentioned in England as early as 1616 in plays by Ben Jonson. Numerous examples began to appear around the mid-17th century, often as the concluding movement in a suite; they include works by William Lawes, John Jenkins, Matthew Locke, Charles Coleman, Simon Ives (i), Mace, Blow, Purcell, Croft and others. Mace described sarabands as being of the 'shortest triple-time' (Musick's Monument, London, 1676/R, p.129), which corresponds with Ricci's suggestion for the tempo of Italian sarabandas. The slower French type, however, also became popular in England and was perhaps introduced by the Italian guitarist Corbetta, who was in France by 1656 and in England by 1662. One of his sarabands played a prominent role in a scandalous adventure and was so popular that all the guitarists at the English court were playing it (Anthony Hamilton's memoirs of Count Gramont). An English keyboard manuscript from the late Baroque period (F-Pc Rés.1186*bis*) included some sarabandes entitled 'slow sar.'. Tomlinson (The Art of Dancing, London, 1735/R, i) showed a saraband in 3/4 marked 'slow' (see illustration) and one in 3/2 marked 'very slow' (pl.6). Grassineau's dictionary of 1740 describes the motions of the saraband as slow and serious.

Sarabandes are not numerous in Spanish sources. Gaspar Sanz and Lucas Ruiz de Ribayaz continued the guitar tradition, with the title zarabanda francese probably having the same meaning it had for Italian guitar composers. French influence is seen in a keyboard piece, Zarabanda francesa despacio, in Martín y Coll's collection (E-Mn 1357); similarly, Santiago de Murcia (1714) labelled a guitar composition Zarabanda despacio.

(ii) France and Germany. Most French and German sarabandes of the mid- and late Baroque appear as one of the dances in suites for a solo instrument such as keyboard or lute, and in continuo chamber suites for violin or other instruments. They are characterized by an intense, serious affect, though a few are tender and gracious, and are set in slow triple metre with a strong sense of balance based on four-bar phrases. A bipartite structure (AABB) is most common, though variations and rondeau form may also be found, often with ornamented reprises or doubles. Frequently a petite reprise occurs at the end, an exact or slightly varied repetition of the last four bars of the piece. The syncopated rhythm of ex.4*a* may appear in any bar and is often used for dramatic effect (ex.7). A few sarabandes have an anacrusis, though most do not.

French composers wrote solo sarabandes for lute (Ennemond and Denis Gaultier; Jacques Gallot (ii)), clavecin (Pinel, René Mesangeau, Chambonnières, Louis Couperin, Lebègue, D'Anglebert, Louis Marchand, François Couperin, Rameau), viol (Marais) and guitar (Visée, François Campion). Sarabandes appeared frequently in French ballets and operas (by, for example, Lully, Lalande, Collasse, Lacoste, Campra, Destouches and Rameau). Surviving choreographic sources in publications dating from 1700 include 27 pieces to be performed by one or two dancers, with orchestral accompaniment for theatrical performance, and with a small ensemble for social dancing (Little and Marsh). Ecorcheville's Vingt suites d'orchestre du XVIIe siècle français (Paris, 1906/R), an early source of instrumental suites to accompany dancing, contains numerous sarabandes. French composers (Brossard, L'Affilard and Bacilly, for example) also set sarabandes as vocal airs. Sarabandes sometimes merged with other similar dance types, such as the canary (Sarabande en canarie, in F-Pn Vm$^6$5), chaconne, passacaille and folia or folies d'Espagne. One German dance treatise described the folia tune as 'the most famous of all sarabande melodies' (Gottfried Taubert, Rechtschaffenèr Tanzmeister, Leipzig, 1717).

J.S. Bach composed more sarabandes than any other dance type. His 39 surviving sarabandes are all virtuoso pieces in suites for a solo instrument (keyboard, cello, flute, violin or lute) except for the one in the Orchestral Suite in B minorBWV1067. They display a rich variety of techniques and styles, including variations or written-out doubles (BWV808, 811 and 1002), elaborate, dramatic italianate flourishes (BWV806, 828 and 1007), entrée grave style (BWV829 and 1010) and even strict canon at the 12th (BWV1067). Sarabandes sometimes occur, though untitled, in other works, such as his chorale prelude An Wasserflüssen Babylon (BWV653), the aria to the Goldberg Variations (BWV988) and the final chorus of the St Matthew Passion (BWV244). Other composers of solo sarabandes include J.E. Kindermann, J.C. Kerll, Froberger (ed. in GMB, no.205), J.C. Pezel, Buxtehude, Hieronymus Gradenthaler, Jakob Scheiffelhut, R.I. Mayr, J.J. Walther (ed. in GMB, no.239), Böhm, Pachelbel (ed. in HAM, no.250), Kuhnau, Reincken, J.C. Bach, Telemann and Handel. Sarabandes for orchestra or small ensemble are found in works by G. Muffat, J.C.F. Fischer and Erlebach.

(iii) 19th and 20th centuries. Auber included a sarabande in his opera Les diamants de la couronne (1841). In the late 19th and early 20th centuries, the form gained in popularity, appearing in instrumental works by Debussy (Pour le piano, Images, i: 'Hommage à Rameau'), Satie (Trois sarabandes), Busoni (Sarabande und Cortège op.51), Saint-Saëns, Reynaldo Hahn, Albert Roussel, Germaine Tailleferre, Henry Brant (Two Sarabandes for Keyboard, 1931), and Tippett (a section entitled 'in the style of a sarabande' in The Mask of Time, fifth movement, 1980–82, and in the opera New Year, Act 3, scene ii, 1986–8).

RICHARD HUDSON (1, 2 (i, iii)), MEREDITH ELLIS LITTLE (2 (ii))

Saracinelli, Ferdinando (b Bagnarea [now Bagnoregio], nr Orvieto; d Florence, 26 Feb 1640). Italian poet and librettist. He followed his uncle Cipriano Saracinelli into Medici service in Florence on 1 July 1606. He became a cameriere segreto and by April 1614 was gran cancelliere of the Knights of St Stephen, the naval order founded in Pisa by the Medici. By 1619 he was appointed Balì of Volterra. He was closely involved in entertainments at the Medici court from 1611 to 1637, devising and writing texts for ballettos and similar theatrical pieces (a full list is given in Kirkendale, 609) and even participating as a dancer. He also appears to have had an occasional role in organizing the court musicians, and he was the dedicatee of music prints by Antonio Brunelli (1616) and Jacopo Peri (1619; ed. in RRMBE, l, 1985). His most important libretto was for Francesca Caccini's La liberazione di Ruggiero dall'isola d'Alcina (1625); his lyric poetry was also set by a number of Florentine monodists and other composers, including Lorenzo Allegri, Brunelli, Peri and Domenico Mazzocchi.

TIM CARTER

Saracini, Claudio (b Siena, ?1 July 1586; d Mirandola, 20 Sept 1630). Italian composer. It is impossible to be certain which of the several Claudio Saracinis born in Siena between 1570 and 1590 was the composer. According to one source (of questionable reliability), Saracini published a Lettera amorosa as early as 1600. His documented activities as a composer span the decade 1614–24, when his extant monody books (nos.1–3, 5 and 6) were printed (no.4, if it ever existed, is unknown). On their title-pages he is usually referred to as 'nobile senese', and on the first three as 'detto il Palusi'; whether this latter appellation refers to his membership of an academy is uncertain. It has been assumed that Saracini travelled widely in his youth: the dedications of individual monodies to Monteverdi, Grand Duke Cosimo II de' Medici and Catherine of Brunswick suggest that he had connections in Venice, Florence and even Germany.

Saracini's entire output consists of monodies, except for three pieces for archlute at the end of Le musiche and a short three-part section to conclude the lament Sospirava e spargea [Lamento della madonna]. Including the lament, 133 solo songs are extant and all of them except the Latin Stabat mater are settings of Italian words, ranging from famous texts of the time such as Udite, lagrimosi to simple little poems that are otherwise unknown and may have been written specially for him. He embraced every kind of solo song of his day, from long recitatives and ariosos (the Lamento della madonna, Stabat mater and Lassa, chi mi consola) through madrigals, both chromatic (Cruda mia Filli) and diatonic (O chiome erranti), and settings of sonnets and ottavas to little strophic songs, both relatively serious (Crudel, tu vuoi partire) and artlessly charming (Pallidetta qual viola). There are excellent pieces in every group. He was a master of declamation, responding at his best at once expressively and scrupulously to the text, and he supported his flexible vocal line with bold harmony and a strong bass. Such music may well owe something to Monteverdi; the madrigal dedicated to Monteverdi and the three long recitatives, in which interest is sustained in masterly fashion, are fine examples. Ex.1, from the opening of Cruda mia Filli, demonstrates in extreme form Saracini's penchant for wayward tonality, unusual intervals and surprising juxtapositions of chords (which are not always obvious from the almost unfigured basses); the effect, as perhaps here, is sometimes one of bizarre wilfulness betraying the hand of the dilettante, but there can be no doubt in such passages of his intense response to emotive words. Tu parti ahi lasso is another remarkable song of this type, with no central tonality but with much detailed word-painting; a sense of overall form is sacrificed to the expression of the individual moment. It is no accident that the madrigal poet whom he set most often was Marino, whose erotic and highly charged verses allowed him to indulge his evident passion for such settings.

On the other hand there can be no gainsaying the success and charm of several of Saracini's strophic songs, which show a very different side of his talent: two contrasting representative pieces are Più lieto il guardo, with its strong tonal feeling and sense of form, and Pallidetta qual viola, which, though barred in duple time, in effect consists simply of four symmetrical phrases in 5/4 time.

Saracini has been variously described as a radical monodist, as an experimental composer and as an amateur who was less than proficient at notating his musical ideas. His reputation as a composer dates entirely from after his death. Burney, in 1789, quoted a passage from Amorose dolcezze as an example of early 17th-century vocal ornamentation. After a further century of oblivion, Leichtentritt and Riemann established him as one of the major representatives of Italian monody. During the 20th century his works engaged the interest of musicologists, and eventually of performers as well.

Sarāhang [Husein, Ustād Mohammad] (b Kabul, 1923; d Kabul, 1982). Afghan singer and composer. His father, Ustād Ghulām Husein, recognized early signs of an extraordinary musical talent and sent his son to Delhi at the age of nine to study with Ustād Asheq Ali Khān, an important exponent of the Patiala gharānā. The boy remained in Delhi for 16 years, studying music in circumstances of considerable poverty. He returned to Kabul in 1949. In the following year King Zāhir Shāh awarded him the title Sarāhang (which roughly translates as 'top melody') in recognition of his superiority over all other Afghan singers in the Hindustani styles of ṭhumrī and khayāl. Sarāhang was regularly invited to give concerts of classical music in India. He was also awarded a number of honorary degrees and titles there, such as Kuhi bolandi-e musīqī ('high mountain of music'), Baba-e musīqī ('father of music') and Sar tāj-e musīqī ('crown of music'). Afghans were inordinately proud of his reputation in India.

As well as being Afghanistan's foremost performer of Hindustani music, Sarāhang was celebrated as a ghazal singer. Aware that many of Kabul's ghazal singers often made textual errors, he made a point of studying poetry with Ustād Abdul Hamīd Asīr and became a great authority on the poetry of Bedil. He performed regularly on Radio Afghanistan and had a special weekly radio programme on classical music (1977–9). Having a rather independent personality, Sarāhang refused all entreaties to become an official court singer for Zāhir Shāh.

ABDUL-WAHAB MADADI (with JOHN BAILY)

Sárai, Tibor (b Budapest, 10 May 1919; d Budapest, 11 May 1995). Hungarian composer. He studied composition with Pál Kadosa and held appointments as secretary-general of the Hungarian Musicians' Free Association (1948), head of the music department at the Ministry of Culture (1949), head of the Hungarian Radio music department (1950–53), teacher at the Budapest Conservatory (1953–9), professor at the Budapest Academy of Music (from 1959) and secretary-general of the Association of Hungarian Musicians (1959–80). He served twice on the UNESCO International Music Council (1972–7, 1980–85) holding the posts of vice president (1975–7) and secretary-general (1980–82). He received the Erkel Prize in 1959 and the Kossuth Prize in 1975, and was made Merited Artist of the Hungarian People's Republic.

Sárai's compositional development reflected the evolving climate of Hungarian musical thought; his early folkloristic style came somewhat under the influence of currents from the West, as may be heard in his first String Quartet (1958). The oratorio Változatok a béke témájára ('Variations on the theme of Peace', 1961–4) demonstrates the contemporary concern for humanism in music. His close identification with the communist regime led to his disappearance from public life after 1989.

Sāraṅgī [sāraṅg, hārangī]. Short-necked fiddle of South Asia, found both in the art music of North India and Pakistan and, in related forms, in traditional musics, especially those of Rajasthan and the North-West. Similar instruments include the sarān (Kashmir), sarāng (Afghanistan) and sarāngā (Jammu). In Rajasthan the term sāraṅgī and its variants may be used generically to denote other types of fiddle. In Nepal the sāraṅgī, a term borrowed from India, is either a small fiddle with four strings played exclusively by men of the Gāine caste or a larger instrument with sympathetic strings played by Bādī musicians.

1. The classical sāraṅgī. 2. The Rajasthani sāraṅgī.

1. THE CLASSICAL 'SĀRAṄGĪ'. This is the most important bowed chordophone of North Indian classical music. In matters of structure and technique there is a marked lack of standardization. The typical sāraṅgī is a short lute, made by hand usually from a single block of tun wood about 66 to 69 cm long. There are four main parts: an inferior string holder, and the body, neck and pegbox (there are no frets and no fingerboard). The body is hollowed out and covered with goatskin and a wooden bar is inserted inside, to strengthen it. The waisting is irregular, more marked on the (player's) left side than on the right. The neck tapers slightly towards the top and the back is open. The front is a flat piece of wood, serving in place of a fingerboard, and the neck acts as a pegbox for most of the sympathetic strings. The main pegbox is divided into two sections, both of which are hollow, and houses the pegs for the playing strings and the remaining sympathetic strings. The three playing strings are made of goat gut, and the sympathetic strings (usually as many as 36, though the number varies) of brass and/or steel. The sāraṅgī has at least two, and usually four, bone bridges: the main one, through which all the sympathetic strings pass and on top of which the three main strings rest, is carved in the shape of an elephant, and is placed on a leather strap across the skin cover; a second essential bridge lies at the upper end of the neck and raises the three main strings from it so that they maintain approximately the same distance from it throughout their length. The remaining two bridges enhance the sound of some of the sympathetic strings by their flat surface and fine curve (javārī). The bow is slightly convex and the stick is rigid; the tension of the hair (usually horse) is constant. The three main strings are usually tuned to sa (equivalent to doh), pa a 4th below and sa an octave below the first string. The sympathetic strings are tuned to the notes of the rāga, and often one set is tuned to all 12 semitones of the octave.

To play the sāraṅgī the performer sits cross-legged and holds the instrument against his left shoulder (see illustration). The strings are stopped with the fingernails of the left hand, so that pressure is applied laterally. Fingerings vary from player to player, but in general the same finger may be used for more than one note, so that the vocal slurs characteristic of Indian music may be produced. The bow is held in an underhand grip in the right hand.

Classical sāraṅgī of North India, showing stopping position on the side of strings

Comparison of this description of the typical modern sāraṅgī with earlier accounts suggests that the number of sympathetic strings has increased, while in place of the present three playing strings there were often four. In rural areas of North India a great variety of bowed and generally unfretted instruments go under the name of sāraṅgī and the word can serve as a generic term for bowed chordophones. The continued prominence of the sāraṅgī in folk music is but one indicator that it was originally a folk instrument, incorporated into classical music probably when the khayāl vocal style, with which the sāraṅgī is still intimately connected, came into prominence in the 18th century. By the 19th century it had become associated with dancing girls, and this social stigma has been given as a main reason, along with the sheer difficulty in playing it, for the instrument's decline in the 20th century. Another factor is the rise of the harmonium, which rivals the sāraṅgī as an accompanying instrument.

2. THE RAJASTHANI 'SĀRAṄGĪ'. The state of Rajasthan, in North-West India, is especially rich in bowed chordophones. There the professional musician caste groups are distinguished partly by the instruments they play. Thus the bhopa priests play the rāvaṇhatthā (spike fiddle), the Maṅganiyārs the kamāicā, the Langas the sindhī sāraṅgī and gujrātaṇ sāraṅgī and also the surindā, and the Mirasis a sāraṅgī similar to the classical instrument. All these instruments, or ones virtually the same, may be referred to as sāraṅgī, though not necessarily in the same area.

The sindhī sāraṅgī and the gujrātaṇ sāraṅgī are both smaller than the classical instrument, and have fewer sympathetic strings, though the number of playing strings is four rather than three: the first two are of steel and are tuned in unison to the tonic, but the second string is not stopped and serves only as an optional drone, while the third and fourth are made of gut and tuned to the 5th and lower tonic respectively. The sindhī sāraṅgī is about 56 cm long and has 23 steel sympathetic strings, while the gujrātaṇ sāraṅgī is about 1 cm shorter, with only eight sympathetic strings. The playing style of both instruments differs in some important respects from that of the classical sāraṅgī. The pitch is higher, to suit the high-pitched, even strained male vocal style of the Langas, and the full range of the instrument is rarely exploited, since the aim of the accompaniment is to enhance the song rather than imitate it in all its detail. Another aspect of this is that the bowing is more jerky, and is used as a kind of rhythmic accompaniment since there is usually no drumming or other rhythmic support in this music (on certain other bowed instruments, for example the rāvaṇ-hatthā, the effect is intensified by attaching bells to the bow). Of the two, the sindhī sāraṅgī is preferred and may be used independently of the smaller gujrātaṇ sāraṅgī, but the reverse is not true, for the gujrātaṇ sāraṅgī tends to function as little more than an extra drone for the sindhī sāraṅgī which follows the melody of the song more closely.

NEIL SORRELL

Sarasate (y Navascuéz), Pablo (Martín Melitón) de (b Pamplona, 10 March 1844; d Biarritz, 20 Sept 1908). Spanish violinist and composer. The son of a military bandmaster, he began to play the violin at the age of five and gave his first public performance when he was eight. His precocity aroused such interest that he received sponsorship from the Condesa Espoz y Mina to study in Madrid with M.R. Sáez. Aided by Queen Isabella, he commenced studies with Delphin Alard at the Paris Conservatoire in 1856, winning the premier prix in violin and solfège the following year and a prize for harmony in 1859. He then began the concert tours which made his name famous in every country of Europe as well as in North and South America (1867–71 and 1889–90). His first appearance in London in 1861 failed to attract much attention, but he returned in 1874, playing at a Philharmonic Society concert and at the Musical Union; other visits followed in 1877 (Crystal Palace) and 1878 (Philharmonic) and frequently afterwards. In 1885 and 1886 he performed at orchestral concerts conducted by Cusins, and at the Birmingham Festival of 1885 he played the concerto written for him by Alexander Mackenzie. Sarasate attracted the admiration and friendship of many other famous composers who dedicated their works to him, including Bruch (Violin Concerto no.2 and Scottish Fantasy), Saint-Saëns (Concertos nos.1 and 3; Introduction et Rondo capriccioso), Lalo (Concerto in F minor and Symphonie espagnole), Joachim (Variations for violin and orchestra), Wieniawski (Concerto no.2) and Dvořák (Mazurek op.49). Sarasate incorporated all these works into his repertory and played them superbly. His success in the German-speaking countries, which began with his début in Vienna in 1876, was all the more remarkable since his style differed so radically from that of Joachim, Germany's undisputed master violinist. Occasionally, Sarasate's interpretation of the Beethoven concerto was compared unflatteringly with Joachim's (as in Berlin in the 1880s), which angered him greatly. In spite of his virtuoso inclinations, Sarasate was also a keen string quartet player, both privately and in public chamber music performances. He particularly enjoyed playing Brahms's string quartets but declined to perform his Violin Concerto.

'Arrangement in Black: Pablo de Sarasate': portrait by James McNeill Whistler, 1884 (Museum of Art, Carnegie Institute, Pittsburgh)

Sarasate was the ideal embodiment of the salon virtuoso. His nine recordings (1904; available complete on Pearl Opal CD 9851) confirm critical opinion of his playing, which was distinguished by sweetness and purity of tone, produced with a 'frictionless' bowstroke and coloured by a shallow, fast vibrato, less sparingly employed than was customary at that time. At his best in his own compositions, his tone had little power or dynamic shading. His technique was assured, his intonation was precise, especially in high positions, his use of portamento was varied and frequent, and his whole manner of playing was so effortless as to appear casual. In his Memoirs, Carl Flesch characterized Sarasate's playing by 'aesthetic moderation, euphony, and technical perfection ... he represented a completely new type of violinist', though he might be criticized for a certain lack of musical insight and emotional involvement, particularly in the more classical violin repertory. Sarasate also achieved some fame as a composer of virtuoso violin music. Best known among his 54 opus numbers are the Zigeunerweisen op.20, still an indispensable item in the virtuoso repertory, and the four books of Spanische Tänze (opp.21, 22, 23, 26) which make use of folktunes in elegant arrangements. His fantasy on Carmen op.25 is ingenious and technically difficult, but his limits as an original composer are shown in such superficial pieces as the Introduction et tarantelle op.43. Sarasate bequeathed his two Stradivari violins to museums: his favourite (dated 1724) to the Paris Conservatoire and the other, the so-called 'Boissier' (1713), to the Madrid Conservatory.

BORIS SCHWARZ/ROBIN STOWELL

Saraste, Jukka-Pekka (b Heinola, 22 April 1956). Finnish conductor and violinist. His first studies were in the violin and piano at the Lahti Academy of Music. From the age of 12 he took an interest in conducting, and in 1978 joined the Finnish RSO as violinist. Saraste then entered the fabled conducting studio of Jorma Panula in Helsinki. In 1979 he made his début with the Helsinki PO, and in 1981 won first prize in the Scandinavian conducting competition. He conducted the Helsinki PO during its North American tour of 1982, and the following year co-founded (with Salonen) the Avanti! chamber orchestra, an ensemble specializing in contemporary music. Saraste served as principal conductor of the Scottish Chamber Orchestra (1987–91), with which he toured widely. In 1987 he also accepted an appointment as music director of the Finnish RSO, and with them has toured and recorded in Europe and Asia. In 1993 he won his most important position to date: music director of the Toronto SO. He has since earned extraordinary acclaim for the brilliance of his programming in Canada. Saraste's approach to music-making has broadened over time, and his hard-driven podium manner has matured into a concern for line and proportion. He has appeared as guest conductor with the Boston SO, the Cleveland, Detroit and Minnesota orchestras, the Los Angeles PO, New York PO and Rotterdam PO and with numerous European radio orchestras. He has made notable recordings of music by Bartók, Lindberg, Madetoja and Nielsen, and has recorded a cycle of Sibelius symphonies.

CHARLES BARBER

Saratov. City in western central Russia, on the Volga river. The first documented references to musical life in Saratov, including concerts and opera productions, date from the end of the 18th century. An early 19th-century theatre run by the local governor A.D. Panchulidzev presented the latest works from St Petersburg, eventually becoming an independent institution. From the mid-19th century professional touring opera troupes regularly visited the city, and in 1890 a permanent opera theatre was established, now known as the Saratovskiy Teatr Operï i Baleta imeni N.G. Chernïshevskogo (Chernïshevsky Saratov Opera and Ballet Theatre). Its repertory includes mainstream European operas in addition to many contemporary works, and it has mounted premières of operas by B.A. Mokrousov, G.L. Zhukovsky, G.G. Kreitner and A.S. Lensky. Since 1975 its artistic director has been Yury Kochnev. Saratov also has an operetta theatre and two chamber opera groups. Concerts are arranged mainly by the Philharmonia; notable among the organizations under its aegis are the Saratov Academic SO, an orchestra of wind instruments, the 'Moz-art' String Quartet and the 'Balagan' ensemble.

In 1938 the Saratov branch of the Russian Union of Composers was founded. The leading Saratov composer is Yelena Gokhman, who has written works in all genres, notably operas and vocal music. At the instigation of the trumpeter Anatoly Selyanin the Vasily Brandt International Trumpeters' Competition was held in Saratov. Folk music groups are extensively represented in the region, prominent among them the accordion ensemble Ozornïye kolokol'chiki.

The centre of musical education in the city is the Saratov State Conservatory, founded in 1912 and the third oldest conservatory in the country, after St Petersburg and Moscow. Specialist music courses are also provided by the music faculties of the pedagogical institutes in Saratov and Balashov and the music colleges of the Saratov province (in Saratov, Vol'sk, Balashov and Marks). Festivals and competitions held annually in Saratov include the L.V. Sobinov All-Russian Festival of Operatic Art, the Heinrich Neuhaus Russian Festival and the 'Yuta' competition for young performers of variety songs.

Sarbu, Eugene (b Pietrari, nr Rîmnicu Vîlcea, 6 Sept 1950). American violinist of Romanian birth. He studied at the music high school in Galaţi (1957–68), at the Bucharest Conservatory with Ionel Geanta (1968–70), the Curtis Institute of Music, Philadelphia, with Ivan Galamian and Eugene Ormandy (1970–74), and at the Juilliard School, New York, with Galamian and Ruggiero Ricci (1974–6). He also attended masterclasses with Nathan Milstein (1972–5). He made his début in 1960 as a soloist with the Galaţi State Philharmonic and subsequently achieved an international reputation as a soloist; he also performs in a duo with his sister, the pianist Carmina Sarbu. He has won many awards, including the Rockefeller Prize for Music (1975) and first prizes in the Paganini Competition, Genoa, and the Carl Flesch Competition, London (both 1978). Sarbu has given the first performances of many works by contemporary composers, including the world première of Rautavaara's Violin Concerto (of which he is also the dedicatee) in 1977. Of his recordings, the most significant are the Sibelius Violin Concerto with the Hallé Orchestra and an all-Mozart disc in which he also directs the orchestra. Sarbu was appointed soloist and conductor of the European Master Orchestra in 1982, and in 1995 he established a scholarship fund at the Bucharest Academy of Music (formerly the Conservatory) which provides an annual award for talented young musicians. His playing, on a Stradivarius dated 1729, is distinguished by its purity of intonation and clarity of tone. Sarbu was awarded the 'George Enescu' medal in 1995 and was made an honorary member of the Bucharest Academy of Music in 1997.

Sarchizov, Sergiu (b Tarutino [now in Ukraine], 9 July 1924). Romanian composer. He studied with Jora (composition), Rogalski (orchestration) and Silvestri (conducting) at the Bucharest Academy, graduating in 1954. Sarchizov worked at Romanian Radio (1949–56), conducted the Romanian Railways Ensemble (1951–7), held the secretaryship of the Army Ensemble (1973–84) and in 1992 became a reviewer for the Union of Romanian Composers and Musicologists. Profoundly intellectual and proficient in several languages, Sarchizov has manifested his talent in his compositions, producing a richly-scored and substantial output. Adhering to an expressive post-Romantic style, he has remained outside the influence of the avant garde. Arrangements and transcriptions, primarily for radio and TV broadcast, form a significant part of his work.

Sardà (y Bofill), Albert (b Barcelona, 1943). Catalan composer. While studying for a degree in industrial engineering he trained as a composer with Josep Soler. He then studied flute and cello while reading for an art history degree at the University of Barcelona, and subsequently attended the courses given by Ligeti, Stockhausen, Kagel and Xenakis at Darmstadt (1972). Between 1979 and 1985 he was professor of harmony, counterpoint and the history of art and music at the colleges of Badalona and Manresa (where he was also director). He is professor of aesthetics, history, composition and orchestration at the Barcelona Conservatory. He founded the Associació Catalana de Compositors and was its president (1981–2). He was appointed chairman of the Fundació Música Contemporània, which promotes series of new music concerts in Barcelona and has its own recording label.

Sardá's diverse output includes several works for solo instruments, various chamber combinations, most notably his String Quartet (1975), and songs and orchestral works, freely exploring multifarious idioms. His musical personality crystallized during a formative period spent in London in the mid-1960s, when he became more aware of the breadth of contemporary music compared with Franco's Spain. His interest in rock music and left-wing politics also burgeoned at this time. Sardá's radicalism and polystylism merge most effectively in his opera, L'any de gràcia, first performed at the Alicante Contemporary Music Festival in 1992, then staged in Barcelona and Madrid and later recorded. Setting a powerful libretto (by Pierre Danais), based on the novel El año de gracia by Christina Fernandez Cubas, it focusses on the love-hate relationship between two inhabitants of an island which has been contaminated by experiments in chemical warfare. The dramatic content of each scene creates the basis for an interplay of different elements – atonal, modal, random, completely free – within Sardá's score. His assured craftmanship is most evident in his declamatory Cello Concerto (1986).

The national dance of Catalonia: an elegant and solemnly executed circle-dance performed to the music of the cobla, an ensemble traditionally consisting of flaviol and tambor (one-handed flute and drum), tiple and tenora (double-reed aerophones), but now with more varied instrumentation including two cornets, fiscorno (flugelhorn), other brass instruments and string bass. VÉRONIQUE NELSON

Sardelli, Anna Maria ['La Campaspe'] (b Rome; fl 1649–59). Italian singer. A protégée of Prince Matthias de' Medici, the earliest mention of her is during December 1649 and January 1650, while her protector was Francesco Guicciardini and she was engaged at the Teatro SS Giovanni e Paolo in Venice, when she revealed her intention of becoming a nun. The project came to nothing, and in Venice, after she had left Guicciardini, she sang Campaspe in Antonio Cesti's Alessandro vincitor di se stesso (Carnival 1651), and Cleopatra in Il Cesare amante, also by Cesti, who was probably her lover (Carnival 1652). She left Venice in that year, as a result of stormy love affairs, and returned to Florence, where she sang again in Cesti's Alessandro (1654), singing the libretto. There are references to her until 1659.

PAOLA BESUTTI

Sardena, Orazio (b c1550; d probably in Vienna, July 1638). Italian trumpeter and composer. He served as a brass player and in particular as a trumpeter first at the archducal court at Graz from 1569 to 1572, then for a short time in the household of Archbishop Wolf Dietrich at Salzburg and again from 1595 onwards at the court at Graz. In 1602 he wrote a Magnificat, now lost, for 33 voices. When in 1619 Archduke Ferdinand was elected emperor as Ferdinand II, Sardena followed him to Vienna with the rest of the Graz household. He was still named as a member of the Emperor Ferdinand III's court band in 1637, even though he had been granted a pension in 1622. He was a pupil of Simone Gatto, Kapellmeister of the Graz court, and a colleague of Annibale Perini; after their deaths he published a collection of 52 of their works, all but one of them motets (Venice, 1604, inc.).

Sardinia. An island in the Mediterranean, 24,090 km² in area with a population of 1,648,248 (1991 census). Sardinian music owes its richness to the island's geographical vulnerability; it was dominated in turn by the Phoenicians, the Arabs, Italy (Rome, Pisa and Genoa in succession) and then over a long period (from the 14th to the 18th century) by the Aragonese. It is now a regione of Italy. Despite the efforts of invaders and administrators, Sardinia has managed to remain a remarkably insular cultural area, retaining a strong identity of its own.

1. Sources. 2. Cultural areas and instruments. 3. Vocal music: (i) A tenore song (ii) Sacred polyphony (iii) 'Guitar song'. 4. The musical system.

1. SOURCES. The oldest evidence of Sardinian music dates from the 7th or 8th century BCE. It is a small bronze statue now in the Cagliari museum, depicting a player of the flute (or more likely the clarinet) resembling a satyr, with several pipes in his mouth. This polyphonic instrument was the ancestor of the launeddas or triple clarinet, still played today by expert musicians, especially in the southern part of the island.

Much later, at the end of the 18th century, Father Madau gave more precise details about this musical instrument and others, adding a useful mention of the practice of four-part polyphony. Accounts by travellers, particularly La Marmora, also provide valuable information about the musical culture of Sardinia, including descriptions of funeral rites and the music associated with them, remarks about the localities where the launeddas were played. The first descriptive and more or less complete musical notations did not appear until the beginning of the 20th century. This was also the period of the first recordings (by G. Gabriel in 1924 and 1933), providing evidence of a unique musical art.

At the beginning of the 21st century, popular Sardinian music is still much alive, and has one of the strongest identities in the Mediterranean area. However, here, as elsewhere, social and musical identity has been endangered by the constant growth of two movements: the trend towards folklorization which, from the beginning of the 1970s, led to a reworking of musical material for purposes of spectacle, and the trend towards globalization in the 1990s, operating through the fusion of cultural material of different origins. Both brought profound change to the production and transmission patterns of a musical art that had developed from within over the course of the centuries.

The traditional music of Sardinia is still chiefly connected with festivals: the processional ceremonies of the religious calendar; the long festivals when men and women live together for nine days within the enclosure of a sanctuary (in this case a small country church); Carnival; patronal festivals centring on the veneration of a saint, which tend to be in summer; and political festivals under the aegis of Unità, the organ of the Italian ex-communist party. All these festivals are particularly lively and cheerful, even the Easter festivities relating to the Passion of Christ, and so are the many spuntini, rural parties on a large or small scale organized within the family or among friends, especially at weekends. These convivial and festive occasions are the normal setting for the performance of music.

2. CULTURAL AREAS AND INSTRUMENTS. The centre, north and south of the island are three historically distinct regions, differing considerably in their dialects and corresponding to the three main provinces of Nuoro, Sassari and Cagliari. Roughly speaking, the centre comprises the mountainous part of Sardinia, Barbagia (the country of the barbarians as the Romans called it). This area, where there is a thriving tradition of pastoral life, and civil and religious administration used to be less dominant than in the other regions, is the traditional location of the tenore, secular vocal polyphony, and the sonettu, a diatonic accordion used exclusively for dance music. Typical of the north is sacred polyphony transmitted within brotherhoods, almost like scholae cantorum, and the still extant practice of canto a chitarra (guitar song). Finally, the launeddas is now confined to the south and west, together with the large chromatic accordion which is tending to replace it. All over the island communal dancing, known generically as ballu, plays an important part.

Naturally this rough musical survey of the island divided into three zones, reflecting the present situation rather than the past, leaves out a number of local features, for instance the flute and drum combination played in the village of Gavoi in Barbagia, and special instruments such as the serragia (a fiddle with a resonator made of a pig's bladder, used as a carnival instrument). Other instruments are also found, although not with equal distribution: wood or iron idiophones, drums of different kinds, jew's harps, pipes etc. In all there are about 60 different Sardinian instruments.

Among the musical instruments of Sardinia, the launeddas triple clarinet mentioned above occupies a special place. It consists of three reedpipes (two melodic and one drone). The particular technique of making and playing this instrument, which is specifically Sardinian although related to the Greek aulos and the Egyptian arghūl, and the complex music that the best musicians can draw from it, endow it with an emblematic function. It is still played in processions (fig.1); once it was also used to accompany singing, and particularly to enliven Sunday dancing in the village square.

3. VOCAL MUSIC.

(i) A tenore song. In central Sardinia, the word tenore means a small chorus consisting exclusively of four male voices of different registers: one who takes the dominant part (most important of all, he sings the text), and three who sing meaningless syllabic phrases, such as bim, bam, bom. The ensemble creates a very dense and characteristic harmonic texture. In the aesthetic of the tenore, the common chord is modulated and explored in all the different components of its timbre. The repertory of this type of polyphony, which has no equivalent elsewhere in the Mediterranean, is large: songs on serious subjects; mutos (interwoven sung verses, usually on amorous themes); gosos (religious hymns); anninnias (lullabies); and various dances. The tenore is also used to accompany improvised poetic jousts (gare poetiche), in which poets compete on contrasting themes such as art and nature revenge and forgiveness.

(ii) Sacred polyphony. Firmly rooted in the traditions of the northern part of the island (in Sassarese and Oristanese, and today in the villages of Castelsardo, Santu Lussurgiu and Cuglieri in particular), sacred polyphony probably has its origins in the falsobordone of art music, which was widespread at the end of the 16th century. Its practice is part of the activity of brotherhoods, and in its present form the coro is usually in four parts (occasionally five, as at Aggius in Gallura). In this type of polyphony, as in the tenore, the common chord plays a central part. However, the resemblance goes no further; in sacred polyphony the voices have a different quality of timbre and the harmonic system is much more developed, featuring chromaticisms, the play of unprepared modulations and elements of counterpoint. The basic repertory consists of religious texts such as the 'Miserere' and Stabat mater, and it is performed with the greatest emotional charge during Holy Week and at Easter.

(iii) 'Guitar song'. This type of singing has spread all over the island, although it originated in the north (Aragonese influence cannot be ruled out). It consists of solo songs, originally simple in texture, which, as their name indicates, are always accompanied by guitar. Over the last 30 years, however, the harmonic component has become considerably greater. The singer directs the musical game by inviting the guitarist to follow him and find the harmonies corresponding to his melodic improvisations. On the amateur level, 'guitar song' is performed among friends, in bars or during small rural festivals, but it is also sung by semi-professionals during the main summer festivals, and to village audiences.

4. THE MUSICAL SYSTEM. The wide variety of musical genres, types and situations in Sardinia renders any attempt at synthesis useless. However, the Sardinian ethnomusicologist Pietro Sassu tried, no doubt from an over-evolutionary point of view, to bring the various musical scales employed together into a basically trichordal form (with three conjoined degrees making up a major 3rd), which he thought had then been progressively broadened. Several other ideas also have been partially explored: the system of continuous variations (in the playing of the launeddas) or of contrasting variations (in the 'guitar song'), the role of timbre as an essential component of sound (notably in a tenore polyphony) and some harmonic concepts which owe nothing to the principles of tonal music and have a suggestion of polymodality about them (especially in traditional choral practices).

BERNARD LORTAT-JACOB

Sardonius, Jean (fl 1607–29). Flemish composer. He was succentor of the collegiate church of Notre Dame, Maastricht, on 27 June 1607 and may have been appointed as early as 30 October 1602. He was dismissed on 19 March 1608 'after various remarks and for other reasons'. He may have moved to Ste Gudule, Brussels: certainly a musician of this name was a bassoonist there between 1609 and 1614. According to Vannes, Sardonius became a musician at St Baaf, Ghent, on 15 November 1619. He published a collection of motets (now lost) for two to four voices and continuo, Angelica musica pro praecipius festis totius anni et communi sanctorum (Douai, 1629), and according to vander Straeten a lost six-part requiem and five-part mass were recorded in an inventory at St Walburga, Oudenaarde.

Sardou, Victorien (b Paris, 5 Sept 1831; d Paris, 8 Nov 1908). French dramatist. The son of an impoverished schoolmaster, he started to train as a doctor but abandoned his studies and devoted himself to writing. Managers rejected his earliest plays, historical dramas in verse in the Romantic manner. His first success was Les premières armes de Figaro (1859), a comédie-vaudeville owing as much to Scribe as to Beaumarchais. It was with 'well-made' comedies such as Pattes de mouche (1860) that he established his reputation. He wrote many gay satirical comedies, e.g. Famille Benoîton (1865) and, in collaboration with Najac, Divorçons (1880); a staunch conservative he also pilloried contemporary developments of which he disapproved, and certain political leaders of the day, e.g. in Les femmes fortes (1860) and Rabagas (1872). Probably inspired by the revivals of Hugo's dramas in the 1860s, Sardou turned in middle age to historical melodramas. Patrie! (1869), La haine (1874), Théodora (1884) and La Tosca (1887). In these plays he presented tense, tragic tales of human passion, usually set against the background of a war against an invader or of a popular rebellion, with lavish, archaeologically accurate settings. Some of his melodramas have modern settings, but exotic elements are usually incorporated; in Fédora (1882), for example, he presented a beautiful Russian princess involved in a wildly improbable conspiracy. Throughout his career he took pains to create roles for such stars as Virginie Déjazet and Sarah Bernhardt. He was one of the most regularly successful dramatists of his time, and his plays were popular in London as well as in Paris: Robespierre (1899) and Dante (1903) were written expressly for Irving. Sardou was elected to the Académie Française in 1878.

With his comédies-vaudevilles and later his 'well-made' comedies, Sardou may fairly be regarded as Scribe's natural successor. But unlike Scribe, he was not called on to provide many librettos, and he achieved no real success as a librettist except in Le roi Carotte (1872), written for Offenbach. He took considerable interest in music, however, and was painstaking in his collaboration with Saint-Saëns on Les barbares (1901). Most of Sardou's plays required either songs or incidental music, sometimes on a lavish scale, and numerous composers wrote for them, including Massenet (Théodora, 1884) and X. Leroux (Cléopâtre, 1890).

Composers were immediately attracted by the possibility of making operas of Sardou's melodramas. Patrie!, a stirring tale of the Dutch revolt against Spain, appealed to Verdi for a time. Madame Sans-Gêne (1893, written in collaboration with E. Moreau) was adapted to form the basis of an opéra comique by Giordano (1915) and of Ivan Caryll's operetta The Duchess of Dantzic (1903). Sardou collaborated with Illica and Giacosa on the highly regarded rewriting of La Tosca for Puccini's Tosca (1900), and Colautti fashioned an eventful libretto out of Fédora for Giordano in 1898. Sardou's reputation as a dramatist was short-lived, and, like Scribe, he is now remembered mainly for his contribution to opera.

CHRISTOPHER SMITH

Sarenko, Vasily Stepanovich (b Voronezh, 29 June 1814; d Oryol, 17 June 1881). Russian guitarist and composer. He studied at Moscow University, from which he graduated in 1833, and a few years later took the doctorate in medical science. He first served as a military doctor in Oranienbaum, before being transferred to St Petersburg. As his medical career progressed, he was able to devote more time to the seven-string guitar. Sarenko is considered the last representative of Sïkhra's guitar school. According to Stakhovich, he developed the seven-string guitar further than his teacher. Sarenko published 11 original pieces and seven transcriptions which illustrate his exquisite musical taste, extraordinary musical imagination, and perfect fluency on the instrument. His four guitar études are in fact charming miniatures closer in genre to short fantasias. His transcriptions include excellent adaptations of Chopin's Prelude op.28 no.4 and Valse Brilliante op.34 no.2. Although an outstanding performer, Sarenko hardly ever played in public and rarely taught the guitar.

Sargeant, Winthrop (b San Francisco, 10 Dec 1903; d Salisbury, CT, 15 Aug 1986). American music critic. He studied violin under Artur Argiewicz and Lucien Capet and music theory under Albert Elkus and Karl Prohaska. He spent several years as an orchestral musician, playing violin and horn in the San Francisco SO (1922–4), and violin in the New York SO (1926–8) and the New York PO (1928–30, under Toscanini). His first position as a music critic was with the Brooklyn Eagle (1934–6); from 1937 to 1945 he worked in various capacities (including music editor) for Time and was also a roving correspondent for Life. From 1947 to 1972 he was music critic of the New Yorker, for which he continued writing record reviews after his retirement.

Sargeant's was a powerful voice in music criticism during his New Yorker years, and his clear, reportorial style was directed to the general reader as much as to the musically educated. He vehemently defended the conservative musical viewpoint while dismissing most 20th-century developments in music, though he was always a strong advocate of American jazz; he also championed the music of Anton Bruckner. He wrote several books, including Jazz, Hot and Hybrid (New York, 1938, enlarged 2/1946/R as Jazz: a History, 3/1975), Geniuses, Goddesses and People (New York, 1949), Listening to Music (New York, 1958/R), In Spite of Myself: a Personal Memoir (Garden City, NY, 1970), and Divas (New York, 1973).

PATRICK J. SMITH

Sargenson, John (b Coventry, 1639; d Canterbury, May 1684). English singer and composer. He was admitted to Peterhouse College, Cambridge, on 25 May 1655, took the BA in 1659, and was North scholar there until May 1661. He was then one of the chaplains at King's College until August 1663 and took the MA there in 1662. Ordained deacon by the Bishop of Lincoln on 8 June 1661, and priest by the Bishop of Ely on 20 September 1662, he served as curate of St Edward's, Cambridge, in 1662–3. He was incorporated at Oxford University on 14 July 1663 and apparently began a probationary year as a minor canon at Canterbury Cathedral soon after, taking turns as precentor and sacrist with, among others, John Gostling, whose copies include some of Sargenson's music. He was presented by the dean and chapter to the Canterbury rectory of St George in 1671, and to that of St Mildred by the king in 1672 (St Mary Magdalene was annexed to this in 1681). He held his minor canonry and both livings until his death and was buried at St George's on 13 May 1684.
